REMEMBER, always, that "Canada Dry" is not an artificial, synthetic flavor, but a real ginger ale—made from real Jamaica ginger.

That is the reason for its wonderful flavor. That is the reason it does not burn the lips or bite the tongue. That is the reason it mixes so delightfully with other beverages.

Until you taste "Canada Dry," you have no idea how good ginger ale ought to be. It is so utterly different from the ordinary ginger ale that it might almost be called by another name.

Have you tried it?

Don't let careless laundering shrink or fade them

Washed this way your sport clothes keep their texture and their color

YOU look doubtfully at your smart Kasha cloth skirt, the little sports jacket with its quaint embroidered design. They really ought to be washed, but will it ruin them?

Just one careless laundering—and the proudest of your sport things isn't fit to wear again.

Wash all your sport things with Lux. It won't shrink or fade them.

Sensitive fabrics need special care

Silk and wool are such sensitive fabrics—strong soap actually dissolves them. Even a moderately strong soap or soap chip will destroy their finish, fade or streak their colors.

Just rubbing soap on a favorite wool sweater, for instance, thickens and shrinks it—makes it lose its nice lines.

Lux is safe for all these sensitive garments. There are no harsh ingredients in it to attack the fuzzy woolen fibers of your Kasha cloth skirt or to stiffen and yellow your silk sport blouses.

The feathery Lux suds cleanse all your pretty things gently without the rubbing that injures any fabric. If your sport things are safe in pure water they are just as safe in Lux.

Is your hair radiant with life and lustre?

LUSTROUS, luxuriant hair—so gloriously beautiful that it everywhere wins admiration—is always hair that is glowing with health. It is fed by an abundant supply of blood within the scalp. Dull, lifeless or falling hair is starved hair. It simply needs nourishment to bring back its radiant beauty.

The hair gets its only food from the blood, through the mouths of the follicles. These narrow mouths easily become clogged with dandruff, dried oils, dust, bacilli. Then the oil glands have no outlet. They fill with surplus sebum and begin to press down on the blood vessels, cutting off the blood supply. Or often the circulation is stopped by the natural shrinking of the scalp, if it is not kept flexible.

Leading dermatologists now know that a stimulant, to promote hair growth, must draw a flush of blood to the under-nourished tissues.

This is the scientific principle of Harper Method Mascaro Tonique—the discovery of Martha Matilda Harper—which is used in the 350 Harper Method Shops. Its results are astonishing.

Besides its antiseptic effect on the dandruff bacilli, Harper Method Tonique clears the choked roots and enters deep into the follicles. With a slight tingling sensation and a reddening of the scalp, it draws a flush of blood to the hair roots, the starved hair starts to grow again, and shows active life and healthful vigor.

Generous test to convince you

TO PROVE that Mascaro Tonique will cure the most obstinate cases of falling hair and promote a new, healthy growth, we gladly send you a generous 10-day sample at its cost price. After 10 nightly applications you will see actual results—new hairs, new life and shimmer in the old hairs. This offer includes a copy of Martha Matilda Harper's own booklet, "THE SCIENTIFIC CARE OF THE HAIR AND SCALP," with full and concise treatments for Dry Scalps; Oily Scalps; Dandruff, Tight, Shiny Scalps; Thin, Falling Hair and other hair disorders.

THE very name, "refreshment set," is suggestive of something light and delicious; something fresh and cooling. And Ovington refreshment sets fulfill every suggestion their name implies. Tall glasses, with ice tinkling coolingly against the crystal, fresh mint leaves—why, it's enough to arouse the thirst of the most blasé camel.

Unparch that Throat!

THE Clicquot kid is the most obliging little "unparcher" on earth. He's on the job every time there's a stubborn thirst to kill.

His live, tingling drink is a favorite with nearly everybody—grown-ups and youngsters, any age, any disposition, any time. They all know Clicquot Club Ginger Ale; they all ask for it—and of course they all like it.

Ice-cold—that's the best way.

Only real Jamaica ginger goes into Clicquot Club—the best that grows. And the fruit flavors and cane sugar and spring water—everything in this sparkling, happy ginger ale is the finest in the world.

All these good things in the friendly blend that's been popular for thirty-eight years.

PREPARING FOR THE 1923-24 THEATRICAL SEASON

Gossip on the Rialto

ALTHOUGH the town is but mildly active, the managers' offices and the surrounding try-out villages are humming with new plays these days. Not the least busy of the playwrights at the moment is Avery Hopwood, who is in the act of having two of his new plays produced in Washington. As a matter of fact, three Hopwood plays are being produced in succession down there, but one of them was an old play ("Why Men Leave Home") and therefore doesn't count.

Last week's new one was "The Return," a French adaptation, and during the week to come another play from the French, "The Alarm Clock," will be presented. When he has seen it Mr. Hopwood will just have time to hurry back for rehearsals of still another—this time an original play for Miss Bordoni, called "Little Miss Bluebeard."

The Washington Star had this to say about "The Return," which Mr. Woods, in another column, says he may produce here this season:

> On all sides there was manifest evidence of a greater desire to see Mr. Hopwood, personally, than to give really serious consideration to his new play. It was from the French, and therefore was sure to be "peppy" and "snappy", and "risqué," and all that sort of thing. Yet, strange to say, it fell short in all these expectations. Instead, "The Return" seems rather an attempt to prove the old maxim that love requires deeds, not words, coupled with a picture of the heart of the world since the great war, especially the heart of the doughboy who was willing to give his all for the victory.
> The women are frankly told that, like the dollar, they have lost something during and since the war by getting into the limelight and trying to fill the man's place while he was abroad giving his all for his country. Just now, it appears, their purchasing power is much below par, and they cannot have all they are striving for and yet retain what used to be freely and gladly accorded them.
>
> The problem of a young couple in trying to hold on to the bluebird of happiness is interrupted by the war, which sends the young husband into the thickest of the fight, and to all the honors of a real hero, with his love for the little wife at home as his one constant thought and guiding star, while she, on the other hand, endeavors to carry on for him, in his business and otherwise, until his return. They had their little rows, it is true, due largely to her craving for outward manifestations of his love, while he, loving with all his heart, nevertheless, gave his time almost exclusively to Spanish history, until she was sick of the name of Spain. She hoped all this would be changed when he returned; but it wasn't.
> Meanwhile, a young ensign appears, who can look love, even if he doesn't talk it. He wins his way to the heart of the young wife and a divorce is in sight. At this point, the two men met, after she had solemnly sworn them to keep cool &c., &c. The interview develops that both had won their hero spurs in a certain deadly action, and when the wife rushes into the room expecting to find them in throes of deadly combat over her, lo! and behold, they have forgotten her entirely and are exchanging the affectionate embrace of two old pals who had almost crossed the deadline "over there." She at once dismisses the young ensign, and an old but belated letter arriving on the moment tells her of the unfaltering love of her husband in the hour of his deadliest danger and brings about reconciliation.

Mr. Cohan, they say, rushed "Two Fellows and a Girl" to town because another of Mr. Vincent's comedies, "In Love With Love," is said to be not dissimilar in idea. "In Love With Love" will come to the Ritz on Aug. 6, the production of William Harris.

Mr. Cohan, of course, may be said to have opened the season on Thursday night, but there will be an interval of two weeks before the producers begin to show their wares in quantity. At the present time four plays are listed for production here during that week—"In Love With Love" at the Ritz, "Thumbs Down" at the 49th Street, "The Good Old Days" at the Broadhurst and "The Whole Town's Talking" at the Bijou.

"The Breaking Point," Mary Roberts Rinehart's play about an amnesia victim, will open at the Klaw Theatre around the middle of August. They esteemed it highly on the road. . . . The play originally called "Brains, Inc.," and later known as "We've Got to Have Money," probably will be called "Page Mr. Kilpatrick." It is the work of Edward Laska, and will have Robert Ames in the leading rôle. It will open in Long Branch on Aug. 6. . . . Lionel Barrymore and Irene Fenwick may be seen under the Belasco management during the coming season. Mr. Belasco also announces a play by Mrs. Ethelyn Brewer De Foe, and he is at present in the throes of "Mary, Mary, Quite Contrary," with Mrs. Fiske as its star. Mr. Belasco proceeds in leisurely and sure-footed fashion, and rarely makes more than two productions in a season. . . . An announcement from the Palace Theatre says that Ethel Barrymore has won the title of "Our Lady of Vaudeville," which ends that competition. . . . Marjorie Rambeau has a new play called "The Valley of Content"—has had it for some time, as a matter of fact—and may try it out on the Coast some time soon. The author is Blanche Upright. . . . They say Delysia will be back in New York next season. . . . Mrs. Jacques Martin writes to say that she is, happily, completely well again, following a recent accident. . . . True to announcement, "Dew Drop Inn" will resume at the Astor Theatre a week hence. . . . The Nugents, J. C. and Elliott, will have a new comedy in rehearsal this week. . . . Two plays entitled "Poor Richard" are announced for next season. One of them is by Richard Barry, and will come to the Belmont Theatre. The other, less definite, is the work of Louis Evan Shipman, and has to do with Benjamin Franklin. Maclyn Arbuckle, it is reported, will be the Franklin. . . . Margaret Anglin was seen in San Francisco last Monday night in "The Great Lady Dedlock," but as yet no descriptions of the play are at hand. . . . "Zeno," a thriller that attracted a good deal of attention in Chicago last season, will open at the Forty-eighth Street Theatre some time in August. The Equity Players will not begin their season there until October. . . . Francine Larrimore will have the leading rôle in William Anthony Maguire's "Tin Gods," soon to open out of town. . . . Booth Tarkington's "Magnolia," with Leo Carrillo as its star, will open at the Liberty Theatre on Aug. 27.

Myron C. Fagan has written a play about bootlegging in "Thumbs Down," produced in Atlantic City last week and announced for the 49th Street on Aug. 6. Says the Atlantic City Press, among other things:

> Bootlegging has furnished themes for playwrights from the moral pretenders who like their nips in secret to the adventures of rum runners as in "Zander the Great," or from the side of the unscrupulous agents who work for "somebody higher up."
>
> But so far as now recalled, Mr. Fagan is the first dramatist to indicate how high up the vicious influence can reach. Whoever sees "Thumbs Down" will have it strongly impressed upon them that there is no circle immune from the corrupting touch of the rum ring.
>
> Perhaps the most admirable feature of Mr. Fagan's effort is that he makes the audience accept as bona fide circumstances that are hiding the truth all the time. When the play concludes, the apparently obvious is demonstrated as having been the best kind of bamboozle, and one watches the fall of the final curtain with the reluctant observation, "Well, I'm dashed!"
>
> You'll gather from that, therefore, there is mystery aplenty and, strangely enough, not the sort that makes you guess. That's because you are allowed to suspect mystery until the villains are safely catalogued and crime in high places is given a solar plexus.
>
> It isn't a strikingly original plot. Once it gets well started it rolls along to logical developments, with no great revelation of unique conceptions in situations. But it's a fairly well told tale, and holds the interest in pleasing fashion.

Sam H. Harris, it turns out, has a lien on the musical version of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and probably will produce it here during the coming season. It is entitled "Topsy and Eva," and, with the Duncan Sisters as its stars, is now running in San Francisco. The San Francisco Chronicle joyously describes it as "a great rousing success."

AN AMERICAN SEES "LEE"

By DIANA BOURBON.

Miss Bourbon, who is now in London, is an American actress. She was seen here during the past season in the leading feminine rôle of "Loyalties."

IN his "Robert E. Lee" John Drinkwater has written a very fine play—perhaps even a great play. That only time will show. And once again, as in the case of his "Abraham Lincoln," of which it is labeled the companion piece (while it avoids with complete success ever retreading the same paths), this American epic, written by an Englishman, has been first produced in England by Englishmen. On the whole, surprisingly credibly produced, too—the more so owing to their avowed intention of making no effort "at reproducing the idiomatic character of the South"—they call it "Southern America" as a matter of fact, but that is only because they are English, not because they don't really know! It was a wise decision, especially when one remembers that in the English production of "Lincoln" the negro character, making a great effort at being "idiomatic," spoke Chinese English. "Robert E. Lee" gains by having no such jarring notes.

Mr. Drinkwater's own description of the play is that (I am quoting from the program again) "it is an attempt to dramatise the same event seen through the emotion of the South rather than that of the North." This suggests, to my mind, that it would prove an interesting experiment to perform the plays as a "cycle" of two. The result should be exceptionally fine, for each fulfills, complements the other. As a description, however, it is not entirely accurate.

"Robert E. Lee" concentrates not so much on dramatising a particular event seen through any emotion, as on dramatising the emotion itself, in this case the emotion of the South certainly. Not the reasoning (indeed, it shows us how no room could be left for reasoning when only unquestioning loyalty was asked or needed or exposed), not the political aspect round which "Abraham Lincoln" was written—simply the emotion, the spirit which burned in a part of the American nation through a time of crisis and suffering.

This story of the people who were cut off from all reinforcements or supplies except of their own, who, whether right or wrong, for four years put up a heroic fight for their own tribe against overwhelming odds and their fellow-countrymen; and who lost their fight, as, from the reasons for it, it was right that they should, has no novelty for us as it has to the English public. It is a familiar story, but still one to be proud of, for no country's history can offer anything to excel it. And now that the war is nearly two generations behind us, that the wound has healed, and even the scar of the wound vanished, all that was good and ill, that was bad alike on the one side and the other belong to the one United States. It is the spirit and the courage of the South, dramatised in "Robert E. Lee," that are precious to us—a heritage that any American may be proud of whether he hails from Chicago or New Orleans. That it was in the wrong cause no longer matters, only the thing itself.

All the wiser, then, Mr. Drinkwater, to give us a minimum of politics and explanations. Even the references to secession and abolition are few. Three short scenes, each illustrating a different attitude or personal problem of the South on the eve of war—and we are plunged into the midst of the simplicity, the enduring courage and utter self-abnegation that it could call forth. It is a strange thing in the life of the world that practically the only times when the virus called "single-mindedness" has been apparent in people have been times of war. And "Robert E. Lee" can boast one of the best battle scenes since Shakespeare—a scene of such reality that even its character of 1862 leaves it real and impressive in spite of the nearness to us of the great war, with all its memories still fresh; a scene all the more moving, perhaps, because of that, and intensely exciting because of itself.

Just as John Drinkwater found that the personality of Abraham Lincoln and the ideals of unity and freedom were what mattered in the North during that period of civil war, and gave them to us in the one play—so he has found out the things that mattered and were worthy in the South and given them to us in the other. But since these worthy things in the South are less bound up in her archives than alive in the spirit of her people, he has had to draw on his imagination for the means to present them on the stage. I think that the element of imagination, being an example of perfect dramatic characterization, has greatly benefited the play.

The new play is less centred in the personality of Lee than its predecessor was in that of the greater man, Lincoln, although the figure of the beloved General is of immense importance in it. But hardly secondary to him are the characters of four young Southerners, each an example of something that the author wanted to show us in the South, and gaining immensely, it must be confessed, by the fact that they are not historical; also gaining immensely by the way in which they are played at the Regent Theatre. Four notable performances—one, indeed (that of Claude Rains as David Peel, the man who never for an instant had any illusions as to the "cause," who hated the war and rebelled against it, and always foresaw the inevitable end of it, yet consistently did his best in it), is quite exquisite. The character of the General suffers in comparison, owing to a performance which can best be described by the English adjective "stodgy." It is not quite pompous, but ponderous; not exactly insincere, but un-simple—and at that utterly devoid of the spirit of romance. So that at the end we are left wondering how such a dull man contrived to inspire others as the play tells us he did; while at the time we are only quite sure that he never by any chance really thought of one of the beautiful things the not ungenerous hand of Mr. Drinkwater has sprinkled in his part. It is the perennial difficulty, of course, in putting great men on the stage. It is all but impossible to act greatness—and few actors are great even as mummers. In this case one felt sure that just so very little of the divine spark would have restored the balance of the play—and explained a little of the devotion to this leader (Mr. Drinkwater, I think, errs in making it incline toward the fanatical) of men like the Stonewall Jackson, of whom he gives us such a vivid sketch, and the four young Virginians who stand for the mass of the South.

And here, I think, in passing one may touch on one of the more outstanding defects of the play. Since we are to have an epic of the South, let it be of the South, * * * but Mr. Drinkwater has made it exclusively Virginian! After all, Virginia did not create and fight and suffer for the war all by herself. But no other State is mentioned in the play. Actions, sentiments, loyalties, patriotism, characteristics, are all filed and pigeonholed as of or by or to or from Virginia — painstakingly pronounced "Vir-gin-i-a," with the stress evenly distributed on all syllables, by the English cast! It is a matter which by no means vitally mars the play, but it is a pity to have localised so strictly what is meant to be so universal a representation.

The whole thing, one would think, might be a trifle confusing to any one unfamiliar with the history of the period and after, unable to fill in the gaps in the play, or even to understand fully the tragedy of the South. But, as a matter of fact, the impression left on one by the story is strangely complete. It seems to go much further than its words. And perhaps that is why the average Englishman, who knows so history but his own, and that very imperfectly, has been wholly able to understand these two stories, to appreciate the proud tradition they are for America, and has accordingly taken both plays to his heart. * * * It was the irony of Fate that pitted the greatness of our Lincoln against the Spirit of our South and frustrated so much of what each might have accomplished, but it is an irony that has not spoiled the story, now that one can look back on it from afar. At the time it was only too true, as David says in the last scene of "Robert E. Lee": "The story one is going to be, doesn't help very much." * * * And so our thanks are due to Mr. Drinkwater, Englishman, for writing our "Robert E. Lee"!

THE LONDON STAGE

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, July 18.—London's heat wave has passed—but too late to save a number of productions. During the hot spell some of London's biggest successes could not more than half fill their theatres, and the semi-successes drew scarcely any money at all. There are now twelve first-class theatres in London closed, including Drury Lane, Covent Garden, the Gaiety and the Lyceum. New plays are being rehearsed for some of them, but most of them are remaining shut indefinitely.

An American play, "Civilian Clothes," is due for production at the Playhouse next week. * * * In August it is probable that the Garrick will reopen with a farce, "Just Married," by Anne Nichols and Adelaide M. Matthews. * * * Shirley Kellogg has acquired a musical play, "Lily of the Alley," by Jack Arnold and Baldwin Sloane, which she will produce here in the Fall. * * * It seems likely that an operetta, "Katinka," by Otto Harbach and Rudolph Friml, which has been seen in New York, will be produced here shortly at the Strand Theatre. * * * "Rain" is coming to London from America under C. B. Cochran's management, as soon as Sam H. Harris can release Jeanne Eagels to play the leading rôle. * * * George Moore's three-act comedy "The Coming of Gabrielle" was staged at St. James's Theatre on Tuesday. It has not been put on for a run as it probably would not last if it were, but, although it does not appeal as a play, it is an interesting piece of stage literature, well written and full of humor.

André Charlot is seeking chorus girls here for his "London Revue of 1924," which he will stage in New York on New Year's Eve.

"I am particularly anxious," says Charlot, "to show New York that English chorus girls are as attractive as any in the world. That there are in England scores of clever girls who would hold their own with the most famous choruses in Paris and New York I haven't a shadow of doubt. But they won't come forward."

The danger which threatened old Vic, mentioned in last week's notes, has been removed by the action of the subway company, which, in view of the public sympathy aroused by the theatre's dilemma, has undertaken to leave the surface of the site undisturbed.

Mr. Woods Again

A. H. WOODS, lately returned to his office from a prolonged trip to the lobby of the Eltinge Theatre, submitted to the following interview the other day, going so far as kindly to assist the interviewer in framing his questions so as to fit the premeditated answers:

Q.—Well, Mr. Woods, I see that you have paid Frederick Lonsdale a $10,000 advance royalty on two plays which are yet to be written.

A.—Yes, I did, and I've already got some of it back directly or indirectly. I got $2,000 worth of publicity right off, which is a direct return, and a friend of Lonsdale's, who saw the announcement, immediately borrowed $1,000 from him, which is an indirect return. Besides, that's the kind of thing I do all the time. It's no more surprising for me to do a daring and unexpected thing like that than it is for Lee Shubert or Arthur Hopkins not to do it.

Q.—Getting down to brass tacks, why did you do it?

A.—Because I saw "Aren't We All?" and liked it. Secondly, I read Lonsdale's play which the Selwyns have, entitled "By the Grace of God," and consider it one of the finest plays I have ever read.

Q.—That $10,000 advance breaks a record, doesn't it?

A.—It breaks a couple of records, both of which I hold. I once paid Charles Klein an advance royalty of $2,500 to dramatize the "Potash & Perlmutter" stories. That was ten years ago, and some of the other managers still maintain that it started the great war, founded the Actors' Equity, and was responsible for the National Theatre failure of "As You Like It." I have paid $4,000 in advance royalties to Robert McLaughlin for his play "The Pearl of Great Price," which has been in the office so long that every time I announce it now Al Jolson wires me for the American rights to the announcement.

Q.—Why do you buy two new plays by Lonsdale and plays by other people when you are already rehearsing six?

A.—It must be Weltschmerz, I guess. Maybe it's the comic urge. Only a psychoanalyst could tell. My great misfortune has been that instead of being a serene fellow like Abe Erlanger, a meditative man like Lee Shubert, a cautious and deliberate student of affairs like William A. Brady, I am as impulsive as Henry VIII. That's what's kept me poor. At 11:20 I read a play that strikes me as being the finest thing that was ever written. I want to see it on the stage. I know very well that by 11:30 the next day I will think no more of that play than of selling Lee Shubert a half interest in a play that I know hasn't got a chance. That means that if I'm ever going to see the play produced I've got to cast it between 11:30 of the first day and 11:30 of the second day. So I do. The next thing you know, I find myself with six temperamental productions on my hands. Sometimes more. The fact that they are rehearsing keeps my interest in them alive and makes me hopeful. This the cold manuscript couldn't do. The fact is, I haven't been able to put my work on a business basis. I'm not a business man.

Q.—You mean you're an artist, I suppose?

A.—To that I could say, by my halibut, "Yes!" I could swear by an Actors' Equity contract that most of my failures have been due to creative ecstasy and most of my successes due to those rare moments when I realize that I must live, ride in a Rolls-Royce and smoke 60-cent cigars. Why don't you ask me how for some dope on these six new plays so that I won't feel that my time has been wasted?

Q.—Can you give me some dope on the six new plays so that you won't feel, &c.?

A.—Certainly. Here is the schedule: "The Good Old Days," a comedy by Aaron Hoffman, will open at the Broadhurst Theatre on Aug. 6. "The Whole Town's Talking," by John Emerson and Anita Loos, will open at the Bijou on Aug. 9. "Red Light Annie," with Mary Ryan as the star, will open at the Morosco Theatre on Aug. 20. "The Woman on the Jury" will open at the Eltinge on Sept. 3. Lowell Sherman in "Casanova" is booked for the Selwyn Theatre on Sept. 17. Kate Jordan's new play, "The Next Corner," with Florence Eldridge as the leading woman, will open at the Empire on Sept. 10. And I shouldn't be surprised if I followed those very soon with "A Gentleman's Mother," by Martin Brown. I've had that for three or four days now and still think it's a beautiful play, so there is no particular hurry about that. I may also do Avery Hopwood's version of "Le Retour," which I am going to see tried out in stock in Washington. How many is that? I may also do—

Q.—Good-bye, Mr. Woods.

A.—Good-bye, feller-me-lad.

VIEWS FROM THE MAIL BAG

John Findlay.

To the Dramatic Editor:

In your review of "You Never Can Tell" in this morning's paper you mention the late George Giddens as having been strongly identified with the part of William, the waiter. As it was my father, the late John Findlay, who originated the part with Arnold Daly in this country, with such great success, it seems only fair that his name might be mentioned. Once before you made this same mistake and kindly corrected it, but here you are again!

The Triangle Theatre.

To the Dramatic Editor:

I am imposing on your courtesy to let the readers of THE TIMES know of a dramatic treat of which I fear most of them are unaware, for, like Kipling's "Bobs," the Triangle Theatre "never advertises." It cannot afford to, as it seats but about a hundred and charges but $1.10 per, but it is in the phone book. So far as I know, it is the only little theatre in New York with a home of its own that is active in these canine nights. And a unique little home it has in a triangular cool cellar on Seventh Avenue, north of Eleventh Street.

It's clean and fresh and adorned with interesting sketches and a couple of masks. Auditors have individual movable chairs back of tables for ginger ale between plays. Sometimes two attractive young women give us standard selections on violin and piano.

At present (barring all too numerous musical comedies and revues) there are but eleven plays in the city, so, having used up all of them worth seeing, I drifted down to the Triangle, and renewed the joys I used to have at the Provincetown Players (when they gave one-acters) and at the Washington Square Players. The first time Romayne Benjamin and Boardman Harriman (both since snapped up by Broadway) were in the casts, and we'd Sada Cowan's "Sintram of Skagarak," a bathtub comedy by the author of "This Side of Paradise," the grim "Cocaine" and another play.

The second time the casts continued good, and a Floyd Dell "Angel" that looked like Harold Lloyd intruded, and was followed by Steele's lighthouse play, "Ropes," Galsworthy's "The Sun," and another piece. Last night a well-lit "Monkey's Paw" came to its shuddersome conclusion. Actors whose costumes but remotely suggested fowl did a comedy about a barnyard, "Single Standard," and an admirably staged "Noah, Jonah and Cap'n John Smith," by the author of the flavorous "Old Soak," brought the evening to a very happy ending. George Haller's wonderful mellow old Jonah was unforgetable, and the audience did not experience the slightest difficulty in swallowing him—in fact, to mix metaphors, he's a whale of a comedian—last call for Jonah, July 28.

Mmes. Ethel Barrymore and Caruso have been to the Triangle, as have a director of the Moscow Art Players, Benavente and other artistic authorities. One of its great attractions is its plaster sky dome with beautiful light effects, and another its director, young Miss Kathleen Kirkwood, who, after running the show, particularly those wonderful lights, emerges immaculate and fetching to greet her audiences.

"The Apache" Again.

To the Dramatic Editor:

It was with considerable astonishment that I read, in THE TIMES of May 27, a letter from Josephine Turck Baker, and learned that she had not been present at the rehearsals of "The Apache" as produced at the Punch and Judy Theatre, "and did not see the play until the opening night." In that case, some unscrupulous woman has been "doubling" for Miss Baker at said rehearsals, interrupting their progress and changing lines and business in a truly reprehensible manner most irritating to players and director.

I had, as I supposed, the pleasure of meeting the author of the play, having been present parts of five days and at the dress rehearsal in the theatre on the day of the opening. On all of these occasions the person who was masquerading as Miss Baker was in evidence for at least a portion of the time. And if the bona fide author "engaged a new director" he did not materialize, for the gentleman who struggled with an impossible script was faithfully on hand to the bitter end, and even unto the third day of production.

Is it not almost beyond belief that such a piece of villainy could have been enacted while Miss Baker was sitting tight, "in close touch with the wires" at Hotel Pennsylvania, instead of "attending rehearsals and watching the direction" of her play, so called? Certainly Equity should take steps to discover the guilty wretch.

I regret that any woman in our great city should have treated an ambitious playwright from the Middle West as cavalierly.

Record Runs of Shakespeare.

To the Dramatic Editor:

Regarding the recent production of "Romeo and Juliet" at Henry Miller's Theatre, the statement has been widely circulated that it had "the longest continuous run of a Shakespearean play at one theatre in the history of the world."

This honor undoubtedly belongs to "The Merchant of Venice," as given by the late Sir Henry Irving at his Lyceum Theatre in London, where it had 253 performances, beginning Nov. 1, 1879, and ending with a benefit to the actor-manager on July 31, 1880. The total number of performances at the end of every week will be found at the head of the dramatic column in the files of the London Athenaeum. See also Frederic Daly's "Henry Irving in England and America," page 62.

Next to this comes "Much Ado About Nothing," which, according to Bram Stoker in his "Personal Reminiscences of Henry Irving," page 63, "began on Oct. 11, 1882, and had an unbroken run of 212 nights, being only taken off because the other plays of the repertoire for the coming American tour had to be made ready and rehearsed."

"Hamlet" had a run of 200 performances between Oct. 30, 1874, and June 26, 1875. This is referred to in the Encyclopedia Britannica, also in Frederic Daly's book mentioned above, page 41, and occurred before Ellen Terry had joined the company, when the tragedy was revived at the Lyceum for about a hundred additional performances.

"Henry VIII." in 1892, had a slightly longer run than the first "Hamlet" production, but in this case the play had to be suspended for some weeks during the Summer, chiefly on account of the illness of both Mr. Irving and Miss Terry, the performances being resumed in the Fall.

The figures for "Twelfth Night" are not at present available.

There have been conflicting statements regarding the number of times that "Romeo and Juliet" was given at Henry Miller's Theatre, though the matter is one easily determined. According to the management (TIMES, April 16), the 100th performance was to fall on April 19 at a matinee, which date appears to be correct. Since then there have been eight performances a week up to June 9, with a special matinee on Shakespeare's birthday, April 23. The matinee announced for Memorial Day was withdrawn. That would give 103 performances altogether, which, according to Bram Stoker, was exactly the number of times Ellen Terry played Juliet, with Henry Irving as Romeo.

SCREEN NEWS FROM EAST AND WEST

Production Difficulties

SINCE the presentation of "Merry Go Round," letters from readers have been received asking that credit be given to Erich von Stroheim for his share of the work in the production—one which he started and Rupert Julian supervised and finished. Naturally a director who takes over a production is held responsible by the producers for anything which he keeps in the photoplay, and, in exercising this authority, he must also be responsible for the success or failure of the picture. However, here is what Rupert Julian telegraphed from Los Angeles for THE NEW YORK TIMES today:

"Following your request through Universal I will give you the facts concerning the production of 'Merry Go Round.' Mr. von Stroheim started the production on Aug. 28, 1922. I was placed in charge on Oct. 7, without any opportunity whatever for preparation. I assumed charge, therefore, and in order to progress with as little chaos as possible, I retained the staff and most of the original cast engaged by my predecessor. Naturally, in the circumstances, I entered the situation facing varying degrees of antagonism, as the staff and cast had been selected personally by von Stroheim.

"The original script of von Stroheim's totaled over 1,500 scenes. When I was placed in charge von Stroheim had shot 271 scenes, using 63,000 feet of film at a cost of $230,000. If I had attempted to complete the production as mapped out it would have been one of footage which could not possibly have been used. And in addition to this matter of excessive footage, the censorship question would have been a serious one, if ever the original script were followed. So when I assumed charge I discarded the original script, and from day to day built the story and characterizations of 'Merry Go Round' as it now stands.

Love Story Original.

"Following several weeks' work on the production, I called in Harvey Gates to collaborate with me on the story I had in mind. And the love story of 'Merry Go Round' as it was presented is absolutely original. In the production, as it stands, the entire footage, with the exception of approximately 600 feet, was directed by me. The introduction of Norman Kerry, Dorothy Wallace and Sidney Bracey, the groom, was not part of my work. One scene of Kerry in a carriage and also that of the banquet sequence and that of the elopement of the Countess with the groom were not mine.

"All the scenes carrying the theme of the story were directed by me, and also all the scenes in which crowds were employed. The retreat of the Austrian army sequence was 'shot' in forty-five minutes through the use of eight cameras.

"I finished the production on Jan. 8. The cost sheet stood at $220,000 when I took the picture over. I spent $170,000 in making all the rest of the production as it was shown on the screen. The reason for my giving these figures is to correct the impression that I was responsible for spending an excessive amount of money in the making of this film. Seeing that I was forced to begin operations with a very expensive cast drawing high salaries continuously, I have been highly commended for holding the cost of production within the figures I have mentioned.

"I had no part in any quarrel or controversy between Universal and Mr. von Stroheim. I have had no thought of raising any question concerning the situation in which I was placed, except that I have discovered that through a misunderstanding some of the New York newspapers have credited von Stroheim with making important sequences in this production, when these sequences actually were originated and directed by myself.

1,500 Different Scenes.

"In the original script there were approximately 4,000 feet of titles alone. Due to the fact that it is impossible to present a production with commercial success with a length of more than ten reels, at the most, in practically all the theatres of the country, and with the exhibitors clamoring for less footage, it easily can be understood that it was imperative to change the story of 'Merry Go Round,' if for no other reason than the fact that 1,500 script scenes and 4,000 feet of titles could not under any circumstances be produced finally under 20,000 feet. And, moreover, it would mean the photographing of several hundred thousand feet of film in order to have the material with which to cut the production.

"Of course, I do not mean to say or imply that Mr. von Stroheim might not have made a successful picture, and even a complete one, from his script. I do say, however, and undoubtedly Universal felt that way, that it would have been a tremendously expensive production. The point upon which I wish to lay especial emphasis is the fact that the film now being shown is my work, with the exception of a few hundred feet.

"From what I have heard I was given to understand that you wished this information, and for that reason I am sending it to you. I do not wish you to think that I am attempting to force my way into a controversy, although I naturally wish that credit should not be stolen from me, since I was compelled under the circumstances to get whatever results I have achieved in making 'Merry Go Round' a success in spite of a difficult task and a great deal of elimination of another's efforts which were not compatible with my own ideas."

George Arliss on Acting

IN an interview in his apartment in East Seventy-fifth Street, George Arliss, stage and screen actor, replied to questions concerning characterization and other phases of motion-picture acting. He slipped his monocle into his eye and in moments of enthusiasm he dropped it to the palm of his hand.

"I think you are right," said Mr. Arliss, "careful characterization is, in my opinion, often lacking in the motion picture today. It is the quality most needed to assure to the photoplay its legitimate position among the arts.

"Curiously, there has been a tendency to look upon the motion picture as a thing apart from the theatre, that is, from the spoken drama. Perhaps this mistaken consideration is responsible in a large degree for the absence of characterization in many present-day productions. Certainly a nearer approach by motion-picture directors and actors to the standards and methods of the legitimate stage will tend largely to correct a situation which, as you say, is engendering harmful indifference toward the cinema in the minds of intelligent audiences.

"I believe that eventually there will not be such a great gulf between the methods of the screen and the stage. At a venture, I would say that the deficiencies of present-day photoplays are attributable to the fact that in its early stage motion-picture production fell into the hands largely of those who had been failures on the legitimate stage.

"By failures on the legitimate stage I mean those persons who had never learned to feel the pulse of an audience. To sense an audience is a matter of tremendous importance for an actor or actress. In rehearsing our parts for stage presentation we read our lines and do our business keenly aware at all times of the psychology of the men and women who will be in the theatre on the opening night. Everything we do is shaped toward this end. Sometimes we are made painfully aware by the presence of the audience that we were mistaken in our judgment of the best way to present certain details, in which event we take immediate steps to remedy the defect. In the second or third nights of a production, having felt the pulse of the audience, we are nearly in harmony.

"The camera, however, is inexorable. Its revelation of detail and character are minute. Unless a rôle is portrayed properly in the taking of a photoplay there is never a chance of readjustment. In my opinion, acting for the screen is an art in the same degree as acting on the speaking stage. It is not merely to be natural, but to portray emotions in such a way that it appears to be natural. Actors who have never learned, through contact with the theatre, to sense the pulse of an audience, are hardly likely to be able to depict emotion. Actors with only studio experience must of necessity lack the knowledge of the magnetism that comes to the actor from the audience.

"As I said, the camera is pitiless in its power. On the stage there may be a situation in which three or four players appear. The eyes and the minds of the audience visualize and regard the situation as a whole. If one of the actors for one night or two nights fails to get the most from his rôle there is always the possibility that the faults of the individual have been lost in the greater whole. Also there is the opportunity of the director to call him to task and improve his work, but there is no such opportunity before the screen. The absence of the spoken word centres the attention of the audience more keenly upon the movement and facial expression of the individual actor. To direct the attention of an audience upon a particular character, the close-up is resorted to. Throwing in which it is evident that thought is lacking are offenses against the intelligence of our audiences. The experience that comes through contact with an audience is of great value in concentrating the thought of an actor, and of making him realize the importance of the dramatic moment."

Asked about the motion-picture director and his ability to compel portrayal of emotion by instructors and exhortations, Mr. Arliss shook his head and declared that it was not possible to do things in that way.

"You can bring out contention, that way," asserted Mr. Arliss, "but only the mere contortion of features. There's one emotion which will probably result and that is rage—rage against the director who perpetrates such a thing. Directors should not be autocrats. That is one of the evils of the motion-picture art today. They should be leaders with ability themselves to recognize the talents of men and women of the stage who have learned their profession, to study these talents in the light of the demand of a story and plot in hand, and to guide these talents in the proper development of such story and plot. Co-operation is the soul of an artistic picture—co-operation between the director and the actors.

Last Scene First.

"The mechanical difficulties presented by the system of shooting photoplays today make this all the more necessary. As the public generally understands, a director may start shooting a picture with the last scene first, the first scene last and all the others in apparently chaotic sequence. Therefore, those who appear in the first shot, which may be the last scene, should certainly be so thoroughly steeped in knowledge of how that scene will cap the climax that it will ring true no matter whether the preceding sequences are taken miles away and five weeks later.

"One of the drawbacks of production is the regrettable habit of starting to shoot without the director always knowing himself, where he is going, what he is to do. On the stage, if we begin to rehearse the third act first no great harm would come, because, before rehearsals, all actors, actresses and directors have often gone deeply into their parts. They know what they are supposed to do in the third act in relation to their entrances in the first, in relation to the big scene in the second and to all of the preceding curtains. We must have this knowledge in motion pictures of the future.

Noise a Nuisance.

"There is another drawback to perfect work by actors before the screen. This is noise. Silence is essential to proper concentration. We realize, however, that it is necessary to continue construction of sets on the various stages, and we have become reconciled to this, but we can be helped in another way. I believe that noises should be thoroughly rehearsed; there should be a perfect understanding between director and actors as to what is to be done, but once the shooting has started there should be no vocal instructions or exhortations, no matter how calmly given; because a person of talent—I do not say temperamental—should be expected to work under such conditions.

"Each year we have a better grade of motion-picture audience; the proper sort of picture attracts to the motion-picture theatres persons who have never before certainly these; this same picture, once seen by persons who formerly were content with a cheap thriller, just as surely raises their standards of taste and appreciation. Gradually audiences are demanding more and more in the matter of screen productions—story, plot and certainly the matter of characterization, which is the breath of life of any dramatic offering."

Mr. Arliss has just finished work in the Distinctive Corporation's production of "The Green Goddess," soon to be presented in New York.

Picture Plays and People

JACK WHITE has just finished "Backfire," which is what is called "A Mermaid Comedy." The scenario called for a big automobile race, and as such races cannot be safely staged in the city limits of Los Angeles, White took his company, the racing cars and their drivers to a small village on the old Santa Monica course, the scene of many thrilling road races in the past. The little town was very dead, without enough persons to provide the necessary "extras." To return to get more people from Los Angeles would have entailed heavy expense and caused quite a delay. So White used a telephone and called up farmers, men on ranches and fruit growers within a radius of twenty miles, inviting them to witness the "thrilling, stupendous, breath-taking, hair-raising road race," free of charge and free lemonade for everybody. In about two hours people began to arrive, bringing with them their children and their lunches. White worked up the proper enthusiasm, and the crowd is said to have been far better than the average throng in such productions. The total cost of the "extras," who were, of course, not paid, was $21.85 for lemonade and $12.40 for telephone calls. And the farmers are said to have enjoyed the sight of the racing.

"Pleasure Mad," is the title selected for Reginald Barker's next picture. It is based upon Blanche Upright's novel, "The Valley of Content."

According to Warner Brothers Viscount Glerawly of County Down, Ireland, is on the screen under the name of Pat Annesley. He will play the part of an ideal butler in "Little Johnny Jones." This is not the Viscount's first appearance on the screen. He has had small parts in English-made films. Off the set when not working, Viscount Glerawly can be seen wearing his monocle while attired as a butler.

Mae Marsh has signed a contract to act in David Belasco's play, "Daddies," which is soon to be disturbed. Mae Marsh will have the part of Ruth Atkins.

It is announced that the next picture in which Mary Pickford will appear is called "My Mamie Rose," by Owen Wister.

After an absence of more than two years Madge Kennedy will be seen in "The Purple Highway," this week at the Rialto Theatre. This photoplay was adapted from the play "Dear Me," by Luther Reed and Hale Hamilton.

"Lawful Larceny" will decorate the Rivoli screen this week. It was directed by Allan Dwan, the outspoken expert who is devoted to his sets, huge rooms and squads of servants. Hope Hampton and Law Cody have parts in this production, and in the supporting cast are Gilda Grey, Florence O'Denishawn and Alice Maison.

Considerable interest has been aroused in production circles regarding Ernest Torrence's work in "The Brass Bottle," which is at the Strand this week.

The first of J. Stuart Blackton's productions for Vitagraph is "On the Banks of the Wabash," a story said to have been inspired one evening by hearing the song of that name.

S. L. Rothafel will introduce a new artist this week at the Capitol. He is Rosalie Baldrich, formerly of the Colon Theatre, Buenos Aires. Mr. Baldrich has sung in most of the leading opera houses in Italy and appeared in Mexico City with Vincent Ballester. Incidentally "Three Wise Fools," which opens today at the Capitol, has in its cast Craig Biddle, Jr. Mr. Biddle is said to bear a great resemblance to Claude Gillingwater when young.

Elmer Clifton has finished his first picture for Fox. It is "Six Cylinder Love," with Ernest Truex in the leading rôle.

Norma Talmadge's ten-real feature, "Ashes of Vengeance," will be presented at the Apollo Theatre on August 6.

Leonore Ulric has begun work on the picturization of David Belasco's play, "Tiger Rose," which is being produced in Los Angeles under the direction of Sidney Franklin. The supporting cast includes Claude Gillingwater, Joseph Dowling, Anders Randolf, André de Beranger, Jane Farrall and Sam de Grasse.

Francis A. Ross has been engaged to play the part of Dolly Baxter in "The Gold Diggers." Others in the cast are Hope Hampton, Louise Fazenda, Wyndham Standing and Alec B. Francis.

"So Long Buddy," the fourth comedy of the first series of six Buddy Messinger-Century Comedies, has been finished by Noel Smith. The story was written by Mr. Smith.

Through a questionnaire sent out by the National Committee For Better Films, calling for the reports on books of fiction published prior to 1920 that are in greatest demand in public libraries, the results obtained through the efforts of Irving H. Hart, director of the Iowa State Teachers' College Extension Division, reveals that the ten books most in demand were: "Three Musketeers," "Treasure Island," "Les Miserables," "Tom Sawyer," "Count of Monte Cristo," "David Copperfield," "Call of the Wild," "Ivanhoe," "Jane Eyre" and "Vanity Fair."

In the filming of "Under the Red Robe" William H. Powell does a great deal of riding in the photoplay, in which scenes he, as well as other members of the company, were instructed by Captain Harry C. G. Mills. Captain Mills had an adventurous career, having lived in China, India and many other countries. When war started he went forth with the Australian artillery as a Sergeant, later being transferred to the Dragoon Guards, recommended for a commission.

William H. Crane, Claude Gillingwater and Alec Francis, who figure in the title rôle of "Three Wise Fools," have a combined record of 125 years on the stage. If it had ever been said ten years ago that these sterling actors would appear on the screen, undoubtedly their colleagues would have laughed. Crane is 78 years old, Gillingwater is 59 years old and Francis is about 60.

William Farnum's latest production is called "The Gunfighter." The story is by John Frederick. "The Governor's Lady," with Robert T. Haines and James Gray at the head of the cast, is a story by Alice Bradley from a play produced by David Belasco. "No Mother to Guide Her" appeals as a typical title for a Fox film. It is now being made in the Fox studios here with Genevieve Tobin in the leading part.

PROJECTION NOTES.

"The Green Goddess," in picturized form with George Arliss, is to open Aug. 12 at the Sam H. Harris Theatre. Among others in the cast are David Powell, Harry T. Morey, Jetta Goudal and Ivan Simpson. The last named won recognition as the English valet in the stage production. Clark Robinson designed the sets, which are said to be extremely elaborate. Indian details of the picture were under the supervision of Roshanara, interpreter of Eastern dances.

In his speech the other night at the dinner given by the Ritz-Carlton Pictures, Inc., Rudolph Valentino said that he objected to a particular clause in his contract which set forth that if "his manner or bearing" was not in accord with the desires of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation he could be laid off without pay for six months. He declared that it was apparently for the producing concern to determine at any time whether his "manner of bearing" was not according to the clause in the contract. He also said that he had refused to work for the concern, even after an offer of $750,000. Although J. D. Williams is optimistic regarding Valentino's contract with Famous Players, the latter firm, from hints dropped by some of the officials, is not disposed to release the actor from his contract, unless he is successful in court.

Every Day He Asks A Question And Pictures These Questioned

THE QUESTION

THE PLACE

Aboard S. S. Leviathan, first trip, New York to Southampton, July 5, 1923—924 miles from Ambrose Channel

THE TIME

THE ANSWERS

CAPTAIN HERBERT HARTLEY, THE LEVIATHAN: "'Little Old New York' most interesting and delightful photoplay, with Marion Davies simply irresistible. Both American and European film fans will later envy the Leviathan's passengers' rare treat. They enjoyed seeing it first."

ALBERT LASKER: "Truly a tremendous achievement. I congratulate Cosmopolitan in setting new standard entertainment value with 'Little Old New York.' Marion Davies deserves all praise for brilliant performance. American motion picture industry should be proud of this photoplay as the nation is of the Leviathan."

VINCENT ASTOR: "No photoplay has ever thrilled or delighted me like 'Little Old New York.' Marion Davies rises to new heights as its star."

ANNA FITZIU, OPERA STAR: "Screen version of popular play superb, and Marion Davies ideal in stellar role. Like it much better than 'Knighthood.'"

SECRETARY OF LABOR JAMES DAVIS: "'Little Old New York' a gorgeous entertainment. No one will want to miss this marvelous photoplay."

CONG. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH: "Here is a motion picture I am certain every lover of real entertainment will find wholly worth while, as Mrs. Longworth and I did."

DARING ACTORS OF THE SCREEN.

MOST persons are inclined to scoff a bit at the so-called risks taken by screen players, and there is no doubt that when there is anything really thrilling to do, it is a "double," considered not nearly as important as the principal player, who takes the risk. This is not because—at least not always—the prominent actor has any qualms about doing the daring stunt, but because the director realizes that if the player should meet with an accident, it would cost the company thousands of dollars.

Leo Noomis is known as one of the daredevils of the screen. But he receives adequate compensation for his work. And in filming some of these scenes with which to send a chill down the spinal column of the spectators, it results in even the calloused director getting quite a thrill himself. There was an example of this recently in "Three Wise Fools," the Goldwyn picture soon to be presented at the Capitol. The story called for a jail-break by convicts, and to make it sensational, King Vidor, the director, conceived the notion of having two prisoners use an armored car to batter through the prison wall.

An armored car, similar to those used in France, which weighed 7,000 pounds, was specially constructed, and Noomis had to run it. The story also called for an airplane to drop bombs close enough to just miss the speeding car, and the wild ride was to end with Noomis plunging the car over the edge of a precipice.

Studio executives shook their heads at the idea of the car going over the cliff, much to Vidor's regret. But Noomis didn't care. It was all in a day's work. So instead of speeding the car over a cliff, he was told to make it turn turtle off the road.

Noomis coolly selected a gloomy overcast Friday the thirteenth, as the day for the stunt. Word went around the studio that Noomis was going to spring a sensational surprise, so that most of the employes and many of their friends took an hour or so off to see the scenes made. They gathered behind the camera, which was grinding away footage of the approaching machine and the low-flying plane, drooping bombs which tore up the road.

About one hundred yards away the great careening iron monster, going about sixty miles an hour, skidded and headed straight for the big throng of spectators. There was a decided movement in the crowd, but Noomis gripped the wheel and swung the armored car at right angles into a barbed-wire fence and with a cloud of dust, whirring and groaning, it turned over in the vineyard off the road. The camera men stuck to their posts, and Vidor, filled with apprehension, sprang to the wrecked car. It was necessary to cut away the barked wire-enveloping the wreck to get at Noomis, who was found to be stunned, but aside from a scratch or so, uninjured. It was expected to see him badly hurt. Vidor said that it was one of the most thrilling stunts at which he had ever officiated.

NEWS AND COMMENT ON CURRENT MUSIC

Chaliapin Discourses On Art of the Stage

CHALIAPIN, who has been in London, talked to a representative of The London Post. He was asked what his favorite roles are.

He smiles and shakes his head. They are like his children. As he looks around on them he loves them all. You mention Boris and his eyes gleam a little more brightly. Yes, Mussorgsky was an enormous genius, the greatest dramatic force in Russian music. Moussorgsky suggests his friend, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and he relates how, one evening at supper at that master's house in the years now gone, four of them, while still seated around the table, sang Borodine's Serenade. Cui was the first tenor, Blumenfeld the second, Chaliapin sang first bass, and Rimsky seconded very seriously and plucking at his beard the while.

His ambitions? Well, he would like to sing Hans Sachs. You suggest Wotan and he demurs.

"If I sing Wotan I must follow my own conception of the part. The Wagner tradition as regards acting, such as Mme. Cosima Wagner and Siegfried Wagner uphold at Bayreuth, does not appeal to me. The actors move in squares. First one stands here in this attitude, and then one stands there in that, and Chaliapin moves about to show his meaning. Could he breathe a new spirit into the dramatic action of the "Ring"? It seems to you that his volcanic personality might achieve this. But as he puts off Wotan and subsides into a Russian in a dressing gown (our talk took place in the forenoon), he deprecates the wish to be such a reformer. Perhaps he thinks that he has enemies enough, for he has already explained that the rumor has been running through Europe that he is going to Berlin for an operation on the throat. "And yet the plain truth is that I am going to Aix and am a sufferer from nothing more than prohibition. Is it not strange what people will say?"

The conversation switches on to Russian songs. He sits down to the piano and, to its accompaniment and the roar of the traffic in Knightsbridge, sings a vigorous Moscow street song:

"Down the Petersky, all along the Twerskoi-Yamsky."

He intends to sing it at his Albert Hall concert on Friday. He thinks, by the way, that the Albert Hall has splendid acoustic qualities. On the table is the song, both words and music his, called "My Songs," an invocation to them to fly out into the world and charm the ears of his fellowmen. No; he would rather not sing it, but he will recite the words, and words that remained to thrill one with its words of an unknown tongue. The refrain of the last verse dies away. You ask if he is going to sing it at his concert. He fears the critics. We assure him their roasting is not so terrible. Anyhow, he will sing it now so we can judge what we think of it.

"Mais vous savez que mon Beethoven est maigre," he says to the first bars of the accompaniment—then sings delightedly a kind of folk-song, full of Russian tenderness and pathos. It is charming, and we tell him so. No; he doesn't think he will sing it in public—at any rate yet.

Some one deprecates his modesty. "If you had liked, maestro, you might have been the greatest actor as well as the greatest singer of your day."

Chaliapin demurs somewhat. "It is true that I have it in me to represent Othello, or Lear, or Shylock, on the stage. I have studied their characters, I have thought about them, and felt how they should be represented. But the actor's vocal technique I do not possess. About opera I know everything. When I am singing I can tell you how softly I can sing (and he produces an ff flat pianissimo) so that it shall be heard all over the Albert Hall. When I talk I can modulate my voice with equal precision, only I do not know exactly how it will reach my audience."

At his second recital in London, where M. Paderewski played his Chopin program, public interest, according to The London Post, seems to have dropped a few points; for it was not so well attended as the first. Empty seats were visible in all directions except toward the balcony — at Queen's Hall, yesterday afternoon. There were other points of difference. When M. Paderewski entered (at a quarter past 3) the audience did not rise, having decided, one supposes, that after all no individual can rank with the National Anthem and the Hallelujah Chorus."

The Times, however, thought it a very large audience. It says: "He had opportunity to raise all sorts of questions, to provoke innumerable criticisms. He certainly took his opportunity. No thinking member of his audience would have come away content with it all; for ourselves the principal causes of offense came in the first part of the Ballade in A flat (surely the swing of the 6—8 time is an essential of its interpretation), in the Scherzo, and in the funeral march itself. He began the last unusually fast, and then checked its movement to prolong the drum rolls. In fact, wherever it was possible that there could be a conflict between structural considerations and emotional expression M. Paderewski made the structure give way to the expression. To object may seem to be to plead for the letter rather than the spirit, but is not rhythm a concern of the spirit? Apart from all such objection, however, he gave us some wonderful playing. And over all there was the sense of a personal conviction which differentiates great music from small.

A new sensation was given to London by the appearance in a song recital of Os-Ke-Non-Ton, a Chief of the Mohawk tribe of Indians. He made what The Telegraph calls a very interesting presentation of the songs of his people in a "weirdly expressive" voice. The program gave the information that "he developed his technique" in New York, which is a thousand pities! It was, indeed, when he was obviously conscious of the demands of "technique" (the technique required for art-songs) that he was least impressive. This consciousness asserted itself in the songs by Lieurance and Troyer, which he sang to pianoforte accompaniment—songs which were all aptly described by the naïve phrase which he applied to one of them "White man's Indian song." Of far greater interest were those Mohawk songs which he sang in native dress, with the lights of the hall lowered and a red glow around him, and to the accompaniment of a water tom-tom. Here there was no technique—save that which Nature gives, and nothing came between us and the song to distarb the atmosphere which they created. The melodies were sung in a "dilisando" fashion, so that the intervals were not too clearly defined, but the tonic, fifth, and octave were always the starting and resting points.

Carl Nielsen, the most prominent living Danish composer, a few of whose works have been heard in New York, gave an orchestral concert of his own works in London. The Telegraph found his major music divided into sections full of contradictions. His symphony" has many passages of striking originality, padded around by others conspicuously the reverse, unblushingly naïve, or academic, or both. The composer's thesis is that 'Music is Life, and like this inextinguishable'; and so you listen for a long time (it seems) to passages for wind instruments, carefully set forth in four-part harmony; then to other long passages for strings in two parts, punctuated here and there by drum beats; and then all play together again. It is all very sectional, and the difficulty at a first hearing is to connect up the sections; and a still greater difficulty is to find any subjective reason for a sudden change of manner from that of Beethoven, Brahms to that of Strauss and back again. He can be atmospheric as Debussy in his 'Pan and Syrinx,' and as full of color and rhythmic vitality as Rimsky-Korsakov in the 'Dance of Cocks.'"

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD

THE American Academy of Teachers of Singing was founded in January, 1922, to deal with questions relating to the teaching of singing, to discuss problems of ethics, and to improve conditions in knowledge, culture and good fellowship. Whether or not the society will eventually take up questions of importance regarding the actual art of singing, as concerns a vocal method, for the future to decide, but a committee had already been appointed to consider English diction and pronunciation for singers. The matter of advertising has received much attention and the members of the Academy condemn false and misleading or bombastic advertising. Much attention has been given to musical education in the public schools, with the realization that future pupils come from the source of the public school. Charles H. Miller, Director of Music of the public schools at Rochester, N. Y., and George H. Gartlan, Director of Music of the public schools of New York City, spoke at the last meeting of the Academy on the question of music, and especially vocal music, in the public schools of the State. Certain decisions have been arrived at regarding the claiming of a successful pupil by a teacher, a point which, definitely settled, should remove much ill feeling from the profession. The question of an American opera company has been discussed for the giving of operas in English, to encourage the establishment of American opera, and to encourage the American singer. Several out-of-town members have already been elected.

The San Carlo Grand Opera will open its New York engagement on Monday evening, Sept. 17, at the Century Theatre, for a run of five weeks, one more than last year. Then the annual coast-to-coast tour will commence. The Pavley-Oukrainsky Ballet Ruse will be a feature of the San Carlo Company this season.

Fortune Gallo has engaged Anna Roselle, the young Hungarian dramatic soprano, late of the Metropolitan Opera. At the close of the New York season Miss Roselle will appear with the San Carlo in Boston, Philadelphia and Rochester. At the latter place the San Carlo opera has been secured for an engagement at the new Eastman Theatre.

Dorothy Jardon, who appeared last season with the San Carlo Grand Opera Company in the title rôle of "Carmen," has been re-engaged for the coming season at the Century Theatre, beginning Sept. 17. Besides further appearances as Bizet's heroine, she will be heard in other rôles.

Selma Lewisohn, an American soprano, made her début as Zerlina in "Don Giovanni" at Baden-Baden with John McCormack, Adamo Didur and Giuseppe de Luca in the cast and with Josef Stransky conducting. Selma Lewisohn is the wife of Walter Lewisohn, the New York banker and nephew of Adolph Lewisohn, donor of the City College Stadium.

Ernest Schelling's "A Victory Ball" will be played by Sousa's Band on tour in an arrangement for brass band made by Mr. Schelling especially for this organization. This work was performed last season by the Philadelphia, Philharmonic and Chicago Symphony Orchestras.

The Chautauqua Institution has engaged the New York Symphony Orchestra for this season. There will be two music weeks, with six evening concerts and one matinee each, while the other weeks will present three evening concerts and a Wednesday matinee. The orchestra will also play at the Sunday evening and song service. The orchestra is under the direction of Albert Stoessel.

Elisabeth Rethberg, Metropolitan soprano, who returned for her season at Ravinia Park, will be heard in oratorio and recital here next season. Miss Rethberg will appear with the Friends of Music in the Pfitzner cantata.

There is no truth in the rumor recently current that Georges Enesco, the Rumanian violinist, is to enter a monastic order. He will spend an active season in America on his second visit to this country, where recitals and orchestral appearances will keep him until the end of the season.

Paris Productions Show Varied Novelty

REYNALDO HAHN'S opera of "Nausicaa" was produced at the Opéra Comique. The librettist, René Fauchois, says Henry Malherbe in Le Temps, has touched lightly on the vast and difficult matters of Homer's "Odyssey"; remaining faithful to the Homeric pageant. His framework is derived entirely from the important passage which extends from the sixth to the first third of the thirteenth book. But Nausicaa, the Princess, has more decided traits than she has in the antique legend. She is adorned with modern graces; she is no longer the unforgettable rustic. She loves the subtle adventurer, Ulysses, with the love of a great lady. Mr. Hahn, who was born with an infinite taste for music, has written a score full of facility, brilliancy and grace. He employs only the pure and simple harmonies that last; that have been proved and are not the fashion of a moment. His languorous grace and his melancholy spirit show themselves in full freedom; and there is much there that is exquisite and lovely. He has a full knowledge of all that is agreeable in the systems of prosperous and erudite musicians. His idyllic music, of an elegant precision, does not fail to transport us into its light domain. The score, classical, melodious, easy is adeptly written for the voices, and its prosody is of an unequaled correctness, as becomes a musician who lays claim to the laurels of a singer. The instrumentation, discreet, tender, not abusing the flutes and the harps, is the product of long meditation. It seems to me, however, that in certain passages, Mr. Hahn's music would comment and illuminate better a voluptuous text of Anacreon rather than the venerable song of Homer.

Another new production, Isaac Albeniz's "Pepita Jimenez," "intoxicating and sensual," was made at the Opéra Comique at the same time. The short work, of a juvenile anarchy, dates from the first period of Albeniz's productiveness, before 1905, and consequently before his genial "Iberia." It was first performed at the Liceo of Barcelona, in 1896, and was played at Prague, then at Brussels. The subject of the libretto is taken from a short story by Juan Valera. The first text, in English, was translated into German, and into Italian; and a French version was made for the Brussels.

But decidedly, thinks Mr. Malherbe, notwithstanding the stimulating music of Albeniz, the intrigue is too simple and too naïve. Though of apparent complexity the subject seems empty on the stage. It is enacted in the seventeenth century, and the dry gallantry that it affects only puts it into still greater contradiction to the rich music of Albeniz. Do not seek in this vibrant orchestration any solicitude for logic, nor of psychology, but harmonies to which respect it is incomparable. Albeniz's music, always brilliant, drenches us in the burning azure of Andalusia, and gives us to breathe all the sharp and sweet perfumes of Iberian gardens. It discloses the Spanish landscape no less faithfully and so intensely that the personages are no longer only capricious and faintly outlined shadows.

The music alone is living and of an agile, bold and inflamed sensuality. Languorous and glowing, chaste and passionate, it mingles mysticism with voluptuousness, the sacred perfumes of incense and candles with the odors of dancing women in action. The composer's rhythmic frenzy is enough for our pleasure. The score, almost entirely made up of scherzos, very skillfully constructed, is only a long, palpitating, exalting and curious nocturne.

The genius of Albeniz is not inferior to that of Chopin. The picturesque and animated pages of "Pepita Jimenez" have an astonishing color. The composer is clearly less happy in his invention in scenes of tenderness. But his overflowing inspiration, passionately popular, ravishes us. During the whole piece the musician's fantasies never cease any more than our indulgence for them. A few passages disclose an inexperience of technique which appears calculated. Since "Pepita Jimenez" the composer seems to have undertaken to work on fugue and counterpoint under the direction of French masters, whose friend he was. Yet all this rhythmical fairy story seems begun with distraction and continued in the same. Under Pepita's balcony Albeniz improvises "copias" and serenades without too much preoccupation with the heroes whom his songs celebrate, nor with their sentiments. But the whole soul of the Spanish race trembles in his dolorous or furious inventions, and there we breathe the dolorous shadows of a hot night in Andalusia.

Stravinsky's new ballet, "Noces," performed by the Russians, is called "Scènes Chorégraphiques." It is, according to Henry Malherbe, in La Tempe, a sort of sung pantomime. The personages, solely occupied with their complicated evolutions of perilous gymnastics, leave to the singers, placed in the orchestra, the task of interpreting the lyric texts. The ones give voices, while the others gesticulate astonishing rhythms. A union of the two functions might be imagined—but where find agile dancers who would be at the same time singers of precision?

Stravinsky's last work seems to be plucked from the deepest roots of the Slavic race. This great composer, as Mr. Malherbe calls him, is able to lend an air of passion and of pure force to the least delicate music. In "Noces" he affects a sort of austere vehemence of dry puritanism, which cannot cease to cause surprise.

If the score of "Noces" be examined, at first sight it does not seem to have demanded much labor. Its logic is the absurd and the new, its strange outbursts, dazzling and sudden, to strident and grinning dryness, denote a genius possessed by the angel of the bizarre. The plan of "Noces" is traced with marvelous amplitude and sobriety. No author draws as imperviously along the rapid parts of his themes. These themes are compressed, forced in their inflexible contours. They surge, they crash together, they unite and separate upon a surface flat and icy as of an arctic sea.

Mr. Stravinsky disdains the accents of the stringed instruments and the brass. His orchestra is composed only of four solo singers, a chorus, a xylophone, two pianos and the instruments of the battery. From this combination, by a spectative orchestra, eagerly novel, the musician derives sonorities, violent, clear cut, irrisistible.

The composer has written the date on which he finished the score of "Noces"—1917. Thus it is earlier than "Mavra," for which I do not yet feel any well-determined taste; and recalls precisely the "Sacre du Printemps." It is, in fact, a synthesis of the "Sacre," a concentrated "Sacre."

The sensations produced by the performances of "Noces" was great, so far as concerned the initiated. I doubt if the public, baffled, will give it a favorable reception. Every new production of this composer seems to mark a new date in the art of music. concludes Mr. Malherbe, and absorbs all the attention of musicians. His thirst for renewing the art, his passion as an explorer, touches us deeply. We owe him not less esteem than we owe the great artists who have known to discoveries. How can we fail to be interested in representations given for the profit of his laboratory?

"Famous in Paris, though not yet heard," according to Th. Lindenlaub in Le Temps, Arthur Honegger's dramatic psalm, "King David" was performed in Paris by the Franciscan nuns of Saint Germain-en-Laye, reinforced by male voices. The work had been given only in Switzerland at a Summer concert. Out of doors, thinks Mr. Lindenlaub, with nature's scenic setting, the chorus and the personages of the sacred drama, the strong and seizing accents of this music of enthusiasm, or of prayer, resounded. It may be feared that it resounded too vigorously in the hall of the Conservatoire. "But such was the ardor, the sincerity, the veritable inspiration of Mr. Honegger, that from the very first song he carried us away. By virtue of the tone and profound accent of the music we were taken back to sacred history, in the air of violent piety, at once anguished and exultant, which only musicians of real greatness are able to create." And those who heard his "Horace" last Winter will have great difficulty in believing it.

Ring Down Covent Garden Curtain

THE last week of the British National Opera's season at Covent Garden in London was made notable by the production of Gustav Holst's opera, "Savitri," a strong contrast to his later work "The Perfect Fool," given earlier in the season; it is a "delicate miniature," while "The Perfect Fool" is "comedy on a grand scale." "Savitri" is "chamber opera. It calls for but three principals, a small orchestra, and a female-voice choir singing wordless music behind the scenes. The story is a little mystic tale from India, as much suggestive as narrative, and the music is as aloof from operatic music as the poem is aloof from the usual operatic libretto. Some of its beauty was dissipated in the large trappings of Covent Garden, and something was lost in performance by the difficulty of detailing such involved and intimate music when there was no intimacy between the various performers. But "Savitri" made an instant impression, not only as a work of imagination, but as a work of invention, resource and mastery, if The London Post may be believed.

The London Times did not like it so well. Recalling the first performance at the Royal College, it says: "The small stage, the improvised character of the singing, the six instruments, the simplicity of everything, made pathos. We seemed to get behind these things straight to human needs and pains. Here—it is no one's fault exactly—the greater size spoils it.

"Three figures in a dim light do not fill the stage, the larger orchestra sounds miscellaneous without sounding rich, or even adequate, the Indianising with a banyan tree and a sari (and Miss Silk does not know why should she?—the language of Indian drapery) and the words which we now hear to have no ring of poetry about them, fail to create any atmosphere. That is created by one thing only—the chorus behind the scenes. They have passages of great beauty now and then even while these were longer; but at any time a single instrument, or Miss Silk's voice, or Mr. Farrington's (Death) standing out against these unseen singers gives an unusual and welcome color to the whole, and that it is not in the least Indian does not matter particularly.

It is to be regretted, says the Musical Times, speaking of recent performances of the British National Opera Company, that the managers now refer to "Melba Nights." "We cannot be expected to regard operas as a serious musical form when a single performer is put forward as being of more importance than all the rest of the cast, the orchestra and the composer. When a Beethoven concert is given at Queens Hall, it is not announced as a "Henry Wood Concert," and if Lamond is playing a prominent part we do not hear of a "Lamond Evening." However important the performers, the great remains a Beethoven concert, and if operas in general were great works, instead of being extra good plays spoiled or fine music tampered by texts beneath contempt as literature, there would be less need to depend upon the booming of stars as an attraction.

Dame Nellie Melba, who is soon going on a "world tour," said good-bye to her London admirers in the Royal Albert Hall, when she was, of course, the recipient of enthusiastic admiration and applause. After much cheering the audience asked for Tosti's "Good-Bye," but she answered, "I am going away—I might cry," and sang instead of it "Comin Through the Rye" and "a brilliant operatic air not provocative of tears."

Joseph Hislop sang the part of Cavaradossi at Covent Garden in "Tosca," and was much admired by The Times.

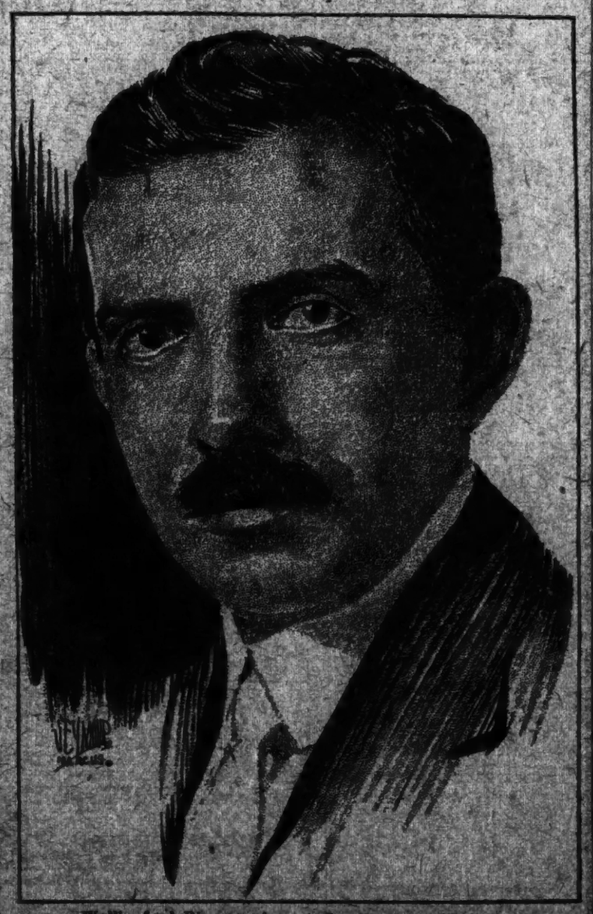
Mr. Gilly and Mr. Hislop both sang in Italian, while Miss Beatrice Miranda sang with the rest of the company in English, says The Times. The "Tosca," being primarily a drama with music, the absurdities of the polyglot conversation are made the more evident, and it was amusing to hear the occasional efforts of individuals to accommodate each other. Spoletta, for example, acknowledged the directions of Scarpia in Italian, and Scarpia mocked the crude question of Tosca, "How much?" in her own barbaric tongue.

Dame Clara Butt gave a concert in the Albert Hall—which her voice can fill, at any rate—in which she had the assistance of Selma Kurz (whose promise to be New York's love never been fulfilled). The London Times says of Mme. Kurz:

"Her voice has all those attributes with which Ben Jonson endowed his beloved in "So sweet is she!" There is none of the hardness in it which we associate with the average coloratura singer, while, as an indication of her amazing technique, we may mention that she can trill for fifteen seconds by the clock.

She also had the assistance of the American Quartet, which, The Telegraph says, "brought something practically new to a London platform. Each of these artists (Messrs. Floyd Townsley, Erwyn Mutch, Sigurd Nelson, and Hardesty Johnson) is a pupil of Jean de Reszke, and each has a voice of rare beauty—the combination being two tenors, a baritone, and a bass. The tenors are not male altos, and the bass is not a baritone; and the continuity of timbre is unbroken in the ensemble from the lowest register of the bass to the highest of the tenor. To hear these Americans at their most characteristic moment—if the phrase may pass—is to hear them sing the 'Swing Along' of Will Marion Cook, or, alternatively, H. T. Burleigh's beautiful arrangement of the negro spiritual 'Deep River.' For such part-singing Londoners owe Dame Clara Butt a debt that it will be hard to repay."

Dame Ethel Smyth took advantage of the opportunity offered by the performance of her two short operas "Fête Galante" and "The Boatswain's Mate," by the British National Opera Company to address and instruct the public between them. Two short operas, she said, could be produced, but an opera company could not give a three-act opera unless it was subsidized. Now Dame Ethel has a three-act opera, "The Wreckers," and does not fail to perceive the necessity of its performance in London. She thought that if the British National Opera Company saw fit to undertake a new British work, the cost of production should be estimated, and an appeal should be made to the public for support. If the public responded the opera would be played. That was the line she proposed to take herself. If the British National Opera Company said they would like to do "The Wreckers," she said she was going to ask the women of England to back her up in it.



Wallingford Riegger, Among Composers at Stadium.

REVIVE OLD GERMAN ART

THE Allgemeiner Deutsche Musikverein held its fifty-third annual meeting this year at Cassel in June, lasting four days. There was much attention given to the new and little-known composers, and hardly any to elder ones. One choral work by Max Reger was given ("Gesang der Verklärten"), two male choruses by Hausegger, and these were the representatives of the venerable past. At the first orchestral concert there was a symphony by Butting, an "Easter Symphony" by Petersen, a "Hamlet" suite by Trossen and songs for soprano and orchestra by Waltershausen. In the chamber concert the name of Hindemith appeared as composer of a sonata for viola d'amore and piano and a sonata for viola and piano; there were also a string quartet by Kundigraber and one by Toch. At a second orchestral concert there was a symphony by Krenek, a concerto grosso for two orchestras and piano by Kaminski, a violin concerto by Bohnke, a piece called "Geschite," fantastic miniatures, by Sekles. Besides the choral works mentioned, there was in the choral concert a "Te Deum" by Braunfels; and it was opened by an organ passacaglia by Scharrer. The City Theatre gave as its contribution to the festival a performance of Gustav Schreker's opera "Der Schatzgräber."

The Allgemeiner Deutsche Musikverein says a writer in The Signale, "has been so often called dead that everybody ought to be encouraged about its vitality. It puts on a worthy representation of German musicianship which today more than ever before has to fight for its mere existence. The Verein puts at the head of its activity ideal aims: 'Cultivation and encouragement of German musical life in the sense of progressive development by means of festival musical and musical-dramatic performances.' Present conditions in concert giving and the publishing trade unfortunately make the production of new works dependent on the financial sacrifices of the composer or his friends, apart from the few composers already famous. A successful performance in the Festival Week, however, may have far-reaching results, for there are usually influential representatives of the conductor's stand, the press and the publishing trade present.

"But any who expect that societies for the promotion of new music will always discover the leading geniuses of the future, and bring them out, do not quite understand the condition of things. Geniuses do not spring up so luxuriantly as asparagus on a well-manured bed; they generally live for a long time unknown, especially if they are a generation ahead of their time. There is really no need to worry about these pillars of a new epoch—some day they will come into their own. But it is important that the productive musicians should prepare the great public, make it receptive for the new and the great. We are to come to the conception of the spirit has numerous forerunners of his mission.

But there should be some serious consideration of the fact that so many of these new young men are writing symphonies, though they have been thoroughly instructed that the symphonic form is thoroughly exhausted, that it is dead, and they are to write nothing but symphonic poems hereafter.

The University Society of Göttingen presents in July a Handel opera festival. Handel's "Otto und Theophane," "Julius Cæsar" and "Rodelinde" will be performed. They are under the direction of Dr. Oskar Hagen, who recently produced "Julius Cæsar" in Berlin.

The Berlin State Opera Company has visited Christiania and given performances of "Salome" and "Mona Lisa" under the direction of Schillings. Barbara Kemp appeared as Mona Lisa and Salome and made a "wholly unusual impression."

Rimsky Korsakoff's opera "The Golden Cockerel" was produced for the first time at the Berlin State Opera with a success that is described as very moderate. The blame is attributed not to the "enchanting" music, but to the heavy and dragging text, and perhaps still more to the offensive stage setting, order, color. The music is found delightful from beginning to end; the orchestral part fragrant and delicate. "It must be remembered, to do justice to this music, that it was produced at a time in which no such morning breeze blew upon us."

In the Vorwärts Kurt Singer finds the music not brilliant or varied enough. Astrologer, Queen and Golden Cockerel all have the same themes; march, war alarm, peasants' song are on the same scale. He praises, however, the simplicity and naturalness of the recitatives, the tender, graceful line of the melody throughout, the oriental character of the Queen's song, the graceful dances, all fine musical gold that fills the second act with light. But the sustained triads in the accompanying after minutes. And the allegory of the piece remains a deep mystery.

Mario Chamlee of the Metropolitan Opera Company reached Prague, where he appeared in the Deutches Theater in a performance of "La Bohème" as Rodolfo, singing in Italian, while the rest of the company sang in German. The Prager Post thought highly of him, though it considered any comparison of his voice with Caruse's as damaging to the singer, because the voice is so different. But his fluency, the noble ease of his tone formation, the delicacy of his dynamic shading, are of the most genuine "southern" art. His expression was somewhat pathetical, it was thought.

They are planning a reconstruction of the old Berlin Opera and the Russian Academy of Architects has submitted a report thereon. It is hoped that there will not be needed a theatre fire to provide for the safety of audience and theatre personnel in the Opera House now for the improvement of the means of egress.

FASHIONS

FEMININE TOUCH SOFTENS CAMPING TOGS

WOMEN and girls who rough it in the Summer time must have their certain kinds of clothes. They may think that the trick is an easy one, but, as a matter of fact, it is much more difficult than the ordinary sort of dressing, unless they are extraordinarily familiar with the requirements of the occasion, the materials that fit the case and the design that will serve satisfactorily through all the hard wear to which the dresses will be subjected.

After all, a woman must look well dressed even if it is on the cold mountainside. If she neglect this, she will live through her vacation with only half the pleasure she should have. Clothes outing clothes of their own. Since that crucial moment the development has been fast and wonderful, and now there is no excuse for any woman going into the wilds unbeautifully equipped or inappropriately outfitted. The time has come when she can bring these two requirements of her nature and life closely together and when she can be as satisfactory to her own innate demands for beauty and smartness and style as ever she is under the lights of the ballroom.

All you have to do in order to recognize the importance of this very type of rough sports clothes is to go about New York and observe the number of shops which handle this class of merchandise only. They are making good in a commercial sense to an enormous degree, which is the hard fact that proves the success of their venture. Then their stock is so thrilling, even to the woman who had never thought of spending any portion of her time camping or roughing it, that she immediately begins to think that, perhaps, the life might suit her, too. She immediately pictures herself in a new role. Before, she had eschewed a life like this because she just couldn't face the ugliness of the clothes she was supposed to affect. Now, all that is changed, and her character and sweetness are helped in a new way by the clothes which are provided for her.

Added to which she sees the possibilities of a development which may come to her through this Summer sort of existence, and she is the first to grab her opportunities, lured on by the clothes just as she has been lured by many another expression.

Look at the three figures in the drawing on this page and you will see three types of rough sports clothes that appeal to women of various temperaments and expressions, not to mention figures. All three of the women here are as smart looking as they can be, and yet there is nothing frilled or flounced or silly about anything they have on. They are entirely womanly in their attires, but they are dressed for hard wear in the open and they carry along with them all that satisfaction and aplomb which come from a knowledge that they are superlatively well dressed according to the standards set down by those who know design and understand the requirements of a life that is to be spent out of doors.

The girl in the knickers is an intriguing sort of person because she has eliminated every extraneous detail—she has done away with all superfluous accoutrements and arrayed herself in the last word of efficiency plus that subtle something which spells style. But her knickers are cut with exactly the right lines to suit her womanly form. They are shaped just right, and in them she has a degree of style which it might be hard for her to attain under more dressy circumstances. She has cut her hair short and left it straight, all of which harmonizes with the general scheme of her dressing and relieves her of any responsibility of supplying curls under circumstances which might possibly forbid such an operation. Her trousers are of khaki linen material. Her blouse, which simulates a shirt, is of the same material, and then she has tied about her neck a striped red and tan tie which gives a certain flare and expression to the whole costume. The collar of her blouse is cut in a graceful manner so that the lines of her neck, while they are clad in perfectly serviceable fashion, still are helped to beauty by the softness that surrounds them. Her throat is not subjected to any hardness of background. On the contrary, she carries with her all of that softness and charm which she has been accustomed to expect from all of her other clothes of various types and characters.

The girl with the plaid skirt has an entirely different expression and still one that has all the adequacy expressed by the knickerbocker skirt. To be sure, she wears a skirt, but it is one with such simplicity of line and so great a degree of perfection in construction that it serves every purpose that the knickers might do. She just happens to be one of those women who do not take easily to the more exaggerated form of dressing. She prefers to carry her dual type into the manner of her outdoor dressing, and this the manufacturers have made it easily possible for her to do. Her skirt is of dark blue with green lines making the plaid. The material is soft and woolly in texture and the skirt is cut with a wrapped effect, so that one side of it opens almost to the waistline, giving her plenty of freedom in walking or climbing, or any other activity that she may decide to adopt. On occasion the skirt may be buttoned all the way to the hem so that it gives every appearance of the most conservative dress. And then, when she wants to step out, she loosens the fastening along the side and, since she has only dark silk bloomers underneath, she is still clad in a most ladylike manner, while at the same time she has given herself every freedom in walking and allowed no hampering seams to obstruct her in whatever she wishes to do.

Her blouse then is made of a light-green flannel, matching in color the lighter of the stripes in the skirt. It is embroidered in spots with a strictly sport design, so that none of the character is subtracted and a great deal of charm is added. The embroidery is done in blue and dark green, carrying out most interestingly the general scheme of the costume.

It is perfectly apparent that all sorts of combinations of dress can be made with this one skirt. There can be, for instance, a green sweater, or a blue one. There can be a tan sweater worn with a dark blue linen blouse, the collar and cuffs of which turn over the sweater's surface. So, with various top pieces this one skirt will serve through indefinite weeks of rough wear and always the girl who wears it will feel as though she is dressed quite properly, with every attention paid to her paramount feeling for clothes and every concession made to the life she has chosen to lead for the time being.

Not every woman looks well in too severe sporting clothes. The fact is that those who do are rather the exception than the rule. And, this being the case, it is wise for women in general to study the type of outing costume just described so that they shall realize just how they should dress and how best to surround their own good points to get the most out of their stay in the open air.

In connection with outdoor clothes hats and accessories become a most important consideration. If they are not just right, then the whole effect of the costume is spoiled irreparably. They must harmonize with, and at the same time manage to accent, the whole or they have failed miserably in taking the parts that are assigned to them. Your costume as a whole may be dull in tone and uninteresting in design. Then, the ties and hats and shoes and stockings are left the burden of snapping it up and placing it in the limelight. On the other hand, if you are choosing sports clothes with a good deal of color and pattern, then it is left to these general accessories to be dark in shade and inconspicuous in arrangement, so that they shall manage to bring the whole costume together and make it a notable whole.

If you are looking for accessories with some sort of pattern, then consider the head band and neckerchief in the lower illustration. These are made from printed silk in many bright colors and they manage to set off a dark blue camping suit with so much aplomb that it becomes at once an important consideration.

Knitted dresses and knitted coats and coats of this material combined with skirts of the same sort are just the best sort of style for this season out of doors. Their colors are fascinating, and as fabrics they are so all around satisfactory that seldom is there to be found a woman who will not fall immediately for the subtle influence of their charm. You can find them in silk or in fiber silk or in wool, and it is hard to tell which is the most satisfactory of the best to choose for the camping you are planning to do. In all of them you will look smart and you will find that they serve the purpose with so much satisfaction that you will wonder how you ever managed to get along before without some costume of the sort. Added to which, at this midsummer season, you can find these things for ridiculously low prices—a consideration which you cannot afford to leave out of your general vacation plan.

A Skirt of Dark Blue and Bright Green Plaid Is Worn With a Bloused Bodice Suited in Every Particular to Camping Life.

The Knitted Silk Sweater Blouse Has Become a Prime Favorite of the Season, for It Can Be Worn for Many Purposes and in Many Climes.

do so much for a woman's peace of mind, and there is no use trying to contend that she will enjoy camping in unbecoming fashion as much as she will if she were snappily and prettily clad with the same result of adequacy and wearability. She may have only a broken piece of mirror in which to reward her looks as she dresses in the morning for the entire day, but if that scrap of reflection shows her to herself at her best, then she will go through that day with a spirit she would never know had the vision she saw been eloquent of dowdiness instead of charm.

Don't try to say—to any fashion expert at least—that you can be happy in a man's pair of breeches and a man's flannel shirt. You may think you are pleased, but you know nothing of the thrill of wearing a shade more of beauty, a touch of femininity and a color note that suits your particular poise of figure and frame of mind.

Men, of course, have attended to this matter until they have perfected their own outdoor clothes to the point of perfection for themselves, but that is no reason to suppose that women can adopt their style with any degree of satisfaction. They can't do this with any more success than they can enter business on a man's basis and in a man's way. They have to dope things out on their own before they will be permanently satisfied, and that they are now in the process of doing.

Few women realize how young and tender a growth is the idea of sports clothes for their own sex. They used to go into the woods in their old clothes not so long ago, until one day some one woke up to the fact that men had solved the problem more perfectly. Whereupon, like sheep, they began copying the things the men had done. That was but the first step. The next development came when some designer with a sense of beauty and the fitness of things decided that women must have

PLANTS THAT MOVE

THE animal kingdom and the plant kingdom have been thought of as separate worlds, but science is finding many connecting bridges. Dr. Fred J. Seaver of the New York Botanical Garden staff, in a recent lecture, said that it has now become absolutely impossible to separate the lower animals from the lower plants.

We think of the plant as stationary, while the animal is able to move about, but many of the lower plants, such as the diatoms, swim about in the water, while many of the lower animals are fixed, he pointed out.

Going higher in the scale than the humble diatoms, we find plants adopting the fixed habit, said the lecturer, while animals developed to a high degree the power of locomotion. This, together with the fact that animals were largely dependent upon plants for food, had apparently resulted in many modifications of structure on the part of either the animal or the plant, or both.

Since higher plants were for the most part stationary, while animals were more active, it was necessary for the plant, generally speaking, to carry on a defensive warfare to keep from being destroyed by its hungry enemies. Many plants, especially the desert plants, had developed protective armaments of spines or thorns. Just how these devices originated, said Dr. Seaver, it was now difficult to say, but that they served their purpose could not be denied.

Again, since higher plants were unable to move about, many ingenious arrangements had been perfected for making use of the locomotary powers of animals for performing some of the necessary functions of plants. The plants used the locomotary powers of insects and other animals mainly in the pollination of their flowers and for the distribution of their seeds. The appeal was usually made to the animal's desire for food, which was offered as bait. In securing the desired food, the animal was made to serve the plant. Brilliantly colored flowers acted as signals, while the nectar which they contained was offered as recompense for the assistance rendered.

ART HOME AND FOREIGN NOTES

SPEAKING of the place sculpture takes in the Royal Scottish Academy, The Scotsman says in part:

"In Scotland sculpture is the Cinderella of the arts. Houses to live in, workshops and warehouses in which to make a livelihood, schools, halls, and theatres for instruction or amusement, churches for worship being essential, architecture is in demand, and, if not always, has pretty frequently a chance of proving itself an art as significant and beautiful as necessary. People, or least the great majority, feel, too, that something to hang on their walls to brighten their houses is scarcely less necessary than a room to cover their heads. So, from the cheap print to the expensive oil painting, there is a demand, in good times at least, for pictures. No doubt much of this buying is uninstructed and without discrimination, but it indicates a natural inclination toward pictorial art, and that in turn suggests that the element in art which appeals most to Scots people is color. Although possessing, in form and mass, qualities quite as great and as emotionally significant though more austere, sculpture cannot give that, at least in the combination of tone and color in atmospheric fusion, in which Scottish painting has usually excelled. Combined with this preference, and also in part explaining it, for the old religious prejudice against images has passed, climatic conditions here are not the most encouraging for sculpture, either indoors or out. But the use of bronze and the greater range of subject, which are gradually superseding the pseudo-classic tradition that kept Scottish sculptors of the past thirled to cold marble portrait-busts and nude figures, promises in time to mitigate that drawback in some degree."

A monument called "Spirit of Music," a memorial to Theodore Thomas, founder of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, is to be erected in Grant Park immediately in front of Orchestra Hall, Chicago. It is to be cast in bronze. The figure itself is sixteen feet high and will stand on a granite base five and one-half feet high. A granite dais or platform reached by three steps will form part of the monument, at the east end of which will be a granite seat forty feet long and eight feet high. On the back of the seat will be carved in bas relief figures representing the orchestra playing, and in the centre a bas relief portrait of Theodore Thomas. The sculptor, Albin Polasek, is head of the modeling department of the Art Institute. Mr. Polasek regards this monument as the best work he has so far accomplished. Its erection was made possible by the will of the late Benjamin F. Ferguson, of Chicago, who left one million dollars "to be used for the erection of enduring monuments and statuary to beautify the parks and boulevards of Chicago." The administration of the Ferguson Fund is in the hands of the Trustees of the Art Institute.

In one of the galleries of the New Terrace addition of the Art Institute, Takeuchi Seiho, a leading modern Japanese artist, is holding an exhibition. There are twelve paintings in all, lent to the Institute by Yoneso Okamoto. Seiho carries on the best traditions of Japanese art. A study of the work of this artist reveals quite clearly the influence of the outlander's art on that of the Hermit Kingdom, for we see form and mass handled with modern feeling. In the picture of the great lion, whose head and shoulders only are shown, there is a solidity of structure and a roundness of form which differs from the flat tones of the early masters.

The traveling exhibition of paintings selected from the Chicago Artists show, held at the Art Institute last February and March, has just been on exhibition at Delaware, Ohio, from which town it will be sent to the Sifrit Company's stores, at Columbus, where it will be extensively advertised.

Most of us have at one time or another collected something, and most of us have relegated our outgrown hobbies and those of our friends to the category of fads, until we found them recognized by some museum or well-known connoisseur. Then they outgrow the ordinary pocketbook, and our chance for the fun of making a collection of our own is gone. This is what has happened to old American pressed glass. Aside from the fascination of gathering it in out-of-the-way corners, its own interest and its place in the historic development of glassware, it brings us a delicate hint as to the etiquette of our ancestors. They considered it quite polite to "saucer" their tea, and so required a little pressed glass plate to set the cup in while they drank from the saucer. These little cup plates have a historical interest, too, as the old factory at Sandwich, Mass., had a custom of stamping designs celebrating political and economic events on their products, as well as the more purely ornamental patterns. In the antiquarian rooms at the Art Institute, Chicago, is a sailboat and above it the title of "Benjamine Franklin." A portrait of Henry Clay is the central motif of another, and Bunker Hill Monument adorns yet another. As part of the joy of collecting is a complete understanding of his material, any one with a hobby of this kind will incidentally acquire a good background of American history, surely a necessity to any cultured person. He may be interested, too, in old factory methods. Sandwich was a prosperous town, with one-fourth of its population dependent on the glass industry, and almost all American born. Apparently, in their care for the poor of the town they were forerunners of present-day social service departments. "Ardent spirits" were not permitted in the factory and rarely used outside its walls, a note in the history of prohibition. Of course, not all the patterns are historical. One dish has two hearts pierced by an arrow surrounded by a lacy platters in which are set four harps, a glass edition of the old paper valentines. Floral patterns, stars, purely formal designs, appear not only in cup-plates, but on saltcellars, glasses, sauce dishes, dolphin candlesticks and various other articles of table ware which would be more likely to be admitted on a modern table.

Even at this late date in the season Chicago galleries are holding interesting exhibitions. At the Anderson Jonas Lie is showing practically the same group of pictures that were exhibited during the Winter season at the Ainsley Galleries. Almost next door Ackermann, the Chicago branch of the London and New York print shop, has a vastly amusing collection of early English color prints and also a few of Eileen Soper's spirited etchings. A spacious etching of Spain by Katherine Merrill is in the window of the Craig shop. The Ho-Ho shop is exhibiting a resplendent collection of Italian textiles, the Artist Guild a dignified showing of the modern crafts of the country.

Beautifully lettered and well designed posters announce two exhibitions at the Art Institute. Lithographs executed by William Blake and colored by his wife, illustrations of Dante's "Inferno," is one. They are more curious than beautiful and too literal to be sufficiently terrifying. The other announcement is for the thirtieth annual exhibition of the Art Students' League of Chicago, which enrolls 2,943 students in its various departments. At the graduating exercises a class of eighty-five young men and women from all over the country received diplomas for their work in the academic, normal printing-arts, sculpture or design departments.

The dyed textiles of the design department, especially those done in two tones, indigo and white on cotton, are noteworthy. Of the sculpture, the low relief is most successful. There is a question whether the most appropriate way of teaching design is through scientific drawings of nature. It eliminates the emotional in design, its most important quality. However, the drawings themselves of insects and flowers are very charming. An exceptionally difficult problem, often very ably solved, is a design in three values of black and white placed into many different kinds of shapes—circle, half-circle, triangle, &c. There are some nice sharp studies in drapery with well-defined darks. There are many paintings in gouache in the illustration classes, with the flat forms finely considered. One of the problems for the design classes is a small painted wooden panel, very gay in color and clean in craftsmanship. The landscape designs are splendid in color. Some of the nature drawings of the advanced classes suggest an Indian botany book. The life work of any school is always a little difficult to contemplate; even here, however, design and composition is considered, especially in the quick drawings. The stitchery is still in its most elemental stage, a beautified craft when developed. Some of the linoleum prints are very jolly, excellently cut and printed. There are a few big textiles, painted with a thick medium, effective but unpleasant in texture. Two or three of the hooked rugs have caught all the charm of that process. Perhaps the most distinguished work is that of the lettering classes. Certainly if the little exhibition of painting, done independently, by the advanced students is an indication of the kind of instruction given in the school, one could ask nothing more of the instructors. It is distinguished beyond student work.

Completed in 1906 in accordance with a bequest made available in 1889, Augustus Saint-Gaudens's seated statue of Lincoln, practically lost and forgotten by the public since 1915, is at last to be set up for the benefit of the residents of Chicago, as was the intent of its donor.

It will stand at the south end of the south wing of the Fine Arts Building in Jackson Park, which edifice has been saved for the public and is to be remodeled. The bronze was considered by Saint-Gaudens to be his greatest work, and it was he who made the statue of Lincoln which now stands in Lincoln Park.

When John Crerar, a millionaire philanthropist, died in 1889, his will set aside $100,000 for a statue of Lincoln which was to face south in a Southern park. The commission was awarded to Saint-Gaudens and in 1906 he finished the cast at his studio at Cornish, N. H., He died a year or so later. The cast was shown at a memorial exhibition of his work at the Chicago Art Institute. The bronze was displayed at the Panama-Pacific Exhibition in San Francisco, and then was shown in New York.

Returned to Chicago, it has lain in a storehouse in a park for years. The personnel of the group of trustees of the fund has changed in the course of years, sites have been selected and discarded, and interest in the statue has waned. Now, however, a place for it has been found.

JUNK-HEAP FOR DOLPHIN, MAKER OF NAVAL HISTORY

ROCKING gently to and fro in the waters of Baltimore Harbor, the gunboat Dolphin patiently awaits her end. No fuss or feathers will be a part of the ceremony. In fact, the ceremony will be in charge of a crew of workmen who will cut her up and pile her piece by piece on the dock until she is utterly destroyed. She is being junked.

The Dolphin is one of the oldest boats in the United States Navy and one of the most historic. She is a pioneer, for back thirty-odd years ago she marked the turning point which has brought the United States up from having a navy second to none (with regard to the bottom of the list) to a point where she is second only to Great Britain, and that second doubtful.

In 1882 we had a navy of sorts. A few old Civil War relics still floated and flew the American flag. Their Captains were justly loath to leave the stable support of good strong piers. We did not have the power to defend our country from invasion by sea or to protect our commerce.

Chester Alan Arthur was President at that time and William E. Chandler was Secretary of the Navy. These two men realized the importance of a navy for the United States, and worked until they got Congress to pass an act on Aug. 5, 1882, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to award contracts for "two steam cruising vessels of war."

At that time the United States relied upon foreign countries for the armor plate with which to build warships. Much debating, criticism and argument pro and con followed. The first act of Congress was set aside, and a new one passed. The new act provided for the building of four warships, but with the provision that they were to be built at a shipyard in the United States and of armor plate manufactured in America.

Many who believed that the United States could not manufacture armor plate and others who thought that no shipyard other than a regular navy yard could build a battleship looked wise and said, "wait and see."

John Roach, who had a shipyard on the Delaware at Chester, Pa., contracted to build the ships for $2,440,000. At that time steam vessels were equipped with full sail power as well as engines, and the contract called for sails. Roach's price was exclusive of masts, sails, rigging and boats.

Work progressed rapidly and the first ship to slip down the ways was the gunboat Dolphin. A horrified shout went up on all sides. Europe scoffed, and Rear Admiral Meade, who was then a Commander, termed her "a marine crazy quilt, with not enough strength to attack an enemy, and not enough speed to run from one."

A change of Administration added to the trouble of the little Dolphin, for upon presentation to the Government she was rejected, structural weakness being named as the reason. Roach, however, had faith in the ship he had built, and urged that she be tested.

Irony of fate! Commander Meade was ordered to take her out and try her seaworthiness. Meade took the Dolphin to Cape Hatteras, "The Atlantic Port of Storms," and there awaited the coming of a hurricane. Before long one came twisting over the waters, and the Dolphin had a thorough trial. She rolled on her beam ends, pointed her stem to the lead-colored sky, and buried her stern under tons of salt water.

Meade gave her a clean bill, and she started on her eventful career as the first ship of the White Squadron, which later on was the pride of every American and the boast of every American seaman.

To discredit further the vicious rumors which were circulated about her, the Dolphin made a trip around the world and figured prominently in naval reviews.

At the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, the Dolphin was under command of H. W. Lyon. She was ordered to take an active part in the hostilities, and throughout the war she performed blockade duty along the Cuban coast. On one occasion, the story goes, upon sighting a Cuban train not far inland entering a tunnel she battered down with her guns both ends of the tunnel, effectually imprisoning the train and its crew.

In 1913, when trouble with Mexico threatened, the Dolphin under command of Admiral Capperton was cruising in Haitian waters. She was ordered to Vera Cruz, and then to Tampico, at which port she nearly precipitated war. A boatload of her men under Paymaster Copp had gone ashore to get supplies. Immediately upon landing they were arrested by order of the Mexican Federal Commander Zaragoza. The men were speedily released, but apologies were tardy, and trouble nearly resulted.

Although almost the oldest boat in the navy, the little Dolphin had not yet exhausted her usefulness. With the coming of the World War ships were in demand. Sailing up New York Harbor, the Dolphin took her place with many newer and more modern ships. All through the years of strife this little vessel was in New York Harbor, overhauling and examining outward bound and incoming ships that were suspected of some violation of the rules.

Her last conspicuous service was when President Wilson reviewed the Atlantic Fleet in 1918. Bedecked with bunting, and flying the four-starred foul anchor flag of the Secretary of the Navy, she took Secretary Daniels and a party of friends up and down the line of gray warships.

In her long term of service she was habitually used by the Secretary of the Navy, Congressmen and other high Government officials for cruises to foreign ports. President Roosevelt had a particular weakness for the Dolphin, and spent much time on her decks.

On Dec. 8, 1921, after thirty-seven years of active service, the Dolphin was put out of commission at Boston. Still containing her original engines, which were practically the same as those used in the wooden vessels of her time, she left Boston on April 12, 1922, in charge of the tug Laborer, and was taken to Baltimore. There she was purchased by the Boston Iron and Metal Company for $10,500.

The influence of this ship upon the history of the navy and of the steel industry of the United States has been large. In every sense the Dolphin was a pioneer, and she made good.

NATIONS COMPARE NOTES UNDER BERKSHIRE SKIES

EUROPEAN statesmen, Asiatic men of letters, South American Ambassadors are traveling from the uttermost parts of the earth toward a little village in the Berkshire foothills, where at the end of this month is to assemble a miniature Versailles—a Genoa, a Hague, a Lausanne, rolled into one. They are gathering from the far corners of the globe, international figures and picturesque leaders, to discuss with a selected group of American men and women that threadbare but ever alluring subject—international affairs.

A practical plan sponsored by men of vision has made this international gathering possible. For the third time these citizens of the world meet in Williamstown, Mass., as enrolled members of what is known as the Institute of Politics. The object of the institute is to promote the study of international relations and problems with a view to creating a more sympathetic understanding of the ideals and policies of our own nation and others. The institute is the realization of an idea conceived in 1913 by President Garfield of Williams College and brought to fruition by his efforts and the financial support of Bernard M. Baruch.

As the institute opens for its third session, there is added interest because of the fact that it may be its last. It was endowed as an experiment to continue three years; the experiment ends on the last day of the 1923 session. Largely, therefore, upon this Summer's work will the practicability of the institute's ideal stand or fall and the fate of its future depend.

The methods adopted for study and discussion are the lecture and the round table conference. The privilege of attending the lectures is extended to the public. People from the immediate neighborhood—the Williamstown general storekeeper, the North Adams pharmacist and the Summer colonists of Lenox and Stockbridge—bend their steps or speed their motors toward the lecture hall.

No explanation of the public lecture is necessary. But of the round tables a word of description may prove of interest; for all that the curious can observe is the gathering of small groups of fifteen to twenty persons each at certain hours in the several buildings of the college campus.

To the initiated the round table means a place where a limited group meet regularly with a leader, to discuss and to debate upon a subject previously selected for study. No member of the institute is permitted to join a round table in which he is not willing and competent to participate, and the number of participants in each is limited in order that each member may have ample opportunity to express his views. The membership of these round tables is thus chiefly composed of writers on foreign politics, including editors and foreign correspondents, persons engaged in the direction of foreign commerce and banking, diplomatic and consular officers, specialists in the employ of the Government—in short, any who have had training and experience in the fields of international law and politics and to whom institute invitations have been extended.

The program for this Summer will continue to emphasize the study of international relations. The armistices which ended the great war were signed almost five years ago, but the problems of reconstruction, rehabilitation, reparations, still remain unsettled. A solution lurks somewhere in a composite expression of opinion by those principally affected. This the Institute strives to obtain.

The British views on postwar problems are to be presented this year by Sir Edward Grigg, Mr. Philip Kerr and Viscount Birkenhead; the French by Canon Ernest Dimnet, and in order that both sides of the shield may be shown, the German by Count Harry Kessler. From the beginning the Institute has pursued the policy of inviting the sincere expression of opinion on problems arising from the war by those who took part on either side of the conflict. At the first session Hungary and Bulgaria were represented and at the second, Austria.

Russia is an ever present subject for conjecture and debate. Some of its many problems will be dwelt upon by Boris Bakhmeteff, former Russian Ambassador at Washington, and Sir Paul Vinogradoff, Professor of Jurisprudence at Oxford. Questions concerning the Pacific will be discussed in a round table led by Professor George H. Blakeslee, a technical adviser on the American delegation at the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Armament, and the outstanding international problems of the American continent will be the subject of a round table led by Dr. Leo S. Rowe, the Director General of the Pan American Union.

Europe has had its opportunity to suggest plans for leagues of nations, world courts, commonwealths of nations and superstates. But perhaps South America is to be the place from which will come a practical theory of this kind. There is much curiosity over the lectures of Dr. Estanislas Severo Zeballos on "A New Type of State."

The theoretical side of the international politics guessing game is to be discussed in round tables which will take up such studies as the conduct of foreign relations under modern democratic conditions, race as a factor in politics, law of the air and the problems of raw materials and foodstuffs in the commercial policies of nations.

With the second Lausanne Conference, after months of weary negotiations, nearly concluded, interest will centre about the round table on the Near East, under the leadership of Dr. William Linn Westermann, who served as the head of the Near East section of the American technical staff attached to the American Delegation to Negotiate Peace.

The familiar and picturesque person of Viscount Bryce, former British Ambassador at Washington, who attended the Institute's first session, will be missed. His spiritual understanding of the Institute's fundamental ideals still lingers in the atmosphere of the place. The subject which Lord Bryce chose for his lectures is still the keynote of the Institute's purpose—the fundamental causes of war and the means of averting them.

Says a member of the Institute, "How often we marveled at his unfailing insight into each phase of a subject so wide in its comprehension as to have filled the heart of the most astute of statesmen with despair. It is not mere sentimentality to think of him as having caught those frequent glimpses, almost inspirational in their clarity, as he tramped over the rocky Berkshire foothills in his daily morning hikes, and to picture him as still preceding us along the mountain tops."

To write of the life of the Institute without dwelling on that side of its activities which although unacademic in nature proved so valuable a part of the whole, would be unforgivable. Living the life of undergraduates, sleeping in the Williams College fraternity houses and dormitories, eating at the Commons, surely no other gathering of notables ever enjoyed a month so free from the humdrum of Old and New World precedent. Baron and professor, Ambassador and secretary, author and cub reporter, mingled as equals in an atmosphere as unconventional and soul-refreshing as it was occasionally droll.

Seldom has there gathered anywhere a group of well informed men and women so non-political in complexion, so idealistic in aim. It is true, of course, that there have been some whose national enthusiasms have colored to a certain degree the impartiality of their statements, but in the main, the opinions of those who lecture and who lead the round tables are free from ulterior motives or propaganda purposes.

It is hoped that the Institute of Politics will be made a permanent institution for the achievement of international understanding; a place where the consideration and interpretation of American and foreign opinion may find sympathetic and ready listeners; an international clearing house of viewpoints; a mountain hollow where the harassing problems of reparations, world courts, oriental politics, may be dispassionately discussed by minds too frequently restrained by the bugaboo of national policy.

No axes are ground at Williamstown, and the dominant desire of all is "to seek diligently after the truth."

DICKENS'S HOME FOR SALE.

GADSHILL PLACE stands on an eminence not far from the City of Rochester, on the River Medway. The English Rochester is famous as the site of the exploits of Falstaff and the "rogues in buckram." Gadshill Place is an Old World red brick building, which appealed to the imagination of Charles Dickens in his early youth, and, when he became famous, he devoted much of his small fortune in 1856 to the purchase of the building to realize his early dream. There he lived, when not away on lecturing tours, from 1860 until 1870, when he died. This famous home of the great British novelist is now in the market.

70,000 WORK PEOPLE CLIENTS FOR WOMAN

She Had a Hard Time Persuading Bench and World to Take Her Seriously.

BELIEVES IN WOMEN IN LAW

Mrs. Anna Moscowitz Kross Says They Are Now Finding Their True Place.

A MAN said the other day, with a sweep of the arm: "In fifty years this will be no place for a man. It will be a woman's world."

Although the world is not likely to change much more in the next fifty years than it has in the last half century, there is no doubt that woman's attitude toward her independence will have something to do with whatever small change may take place. Whenever the story is told of a woman who has risen above her fellows in a chosen profession hard work usually is the pivot on which the story turns. It is so in the case of Mrs. Anna Moscowitz Kross, recently made general counsel to the Building and Allied Trades Compensation Service Bureau, with offices at 128 Lexington Avenue. Mrs. Kross becomes legal adviser to some 70,000 workers.

It is the plan of this bureau, in inaugurating a legal department, to launch an educational campaign for the benefit of its members. A worker may be injured while performing his duty in good faith, but if on investigation it is found that he has failed in adhering strictly to the exigencies of the job he is not in case of accident entitled to compensation. It is to guard against this ignorance and to protect the general interests of the members that the Building and Allied Trades have retained Mrs. Kross.

"I have always worked with the laborer," said Mrs. Kross. "My first case was that of a laboring man who had had trouble with his union. I spent a year unraveling that case, and finally succeeded in having the man reinstated. Attorneys who had labor union cases then began to ask me to help them out."

It was after eight years' private practice that Mrs. Kross was made Assistant Corporation Counsel. She was the first woman appointed to that office.

"I find much of the work here in the Compensation Bureau is listening to domestic trouble," she said. "Just as it was in the office of the Corporation Counsel, but the main work is to keep the men informed of the development of labor union law. A few hundred years ago under an old English law three men meeting and discussing the conditions under which they worked were guilty of a criminal offense. But times have changed, and the worker today wants to know, and is entitled to know, as much about the laws which govern his job as do the lawyers or the organization which employs him."

Started as a Teacher.

Mrs. Kross came to America from Russia when she was a child. Her parents were immigrants. There were nine children. All of them died but three. The girl started out to get an education because she wanted to be a school teacher. It was the quickest way to earn a living, she thought, and she wanted to be independent. But the teaching field was too limited for this ambitious young woman. A young man studying law told her about it. He took her down to visit the Supreme Court and the city courts. She decided that law offered a bigger future. So she taught school at night and studied law in the daytime. At the end of the first year she won a scholarship at New York University. She kept on until she had two degrees and a diploma."

"But I had to wait six months to be admitted to the bar," she added, "I was not of age."

It is now sixteen years since Mrs. Kross went looking for her first legal job.

"Law firms did not want women in their offices in those days, although it has now become the usual thing," she said. "I tramped the streets looking for a job. Finally I put an advertisement in The Law Journal. I tried to make it attractive, stating that salary was no object, mentioning my degrees. When I went to see the first man who answered it, he blinked and said: 'I want a clerk.' 'Well,' I said, 'I am a clerk.' He turned away scornfully. 'We want a man.' It was the same in other offices. I eventually went into the office of a friend where I worked for experience, without salary.

"The hardest thing I had to bear, I think, in that first office," continued Mrs. Kross, smiling, "was the attitude of the fourteen-year-old office boy. He didn't think much of women lawyers and he took no pains to hide his feelings. But I went about with him when he was filing documents; he helped me a lot with office routine and there was no detail of the place I was not interested in. He finally condescended to become my friend. When I had been in the office six months I was made managing clerk. At the end of two years I started out for myself."

Had to Excel Men.

"I also found during my first year's practice that a woman in a man's profession must excel in that profession. What is excusable in a man is not excusable in a woman. The attitude of the Judges toward women lawyers was exasperating, too, in those early days. You went into court with your mind full of your case. You knew you had prepared it as carefully as would a man. You were sure of your facts. But the manner of the Judge immediately became one of relaxed toleration. You could almost hear him say, 'Oh, a woman. Well, we must bear with her as best we can.'"

It was, Mrs. Kross admitted, something intangible, but it made a woman self-conscious.

"It is not so today," she added. "Judges have changed. Most of them treat a woman lawyer exactly as they treat a man lawyer. They are impartial."

Marriage is no handicap to the woman in business, according to this advocate of both. She admitted being glad she had not married a lawyer; she was not sure that it was best for husband and wife to follow the same profession. Mrs. Kross rather thought it was not. But she had been lucky, she said, in marrying a doctor who was willing she should keep with her work. She apparently found it quite possible to keep house and write briefs successfully at the same time.

"My husband says he is perfectly happy and does not feel neglected," she summed it up.

The Board of Directors of the Building and Allied Trades Compensation Service Bureau, which has recently called in a woman for general counsel, are John F. Dayton, Chairman; George Rooney, Charles Hutson, Daniel F. Murphy, Albert F. Day and Harry P. Ellert. The officers are Thomas J. Curtis, General Manager; Peter McCarthy, Treasurer; Samuel G. Bell, Adjuster; Harry Kreit, Secretary, and John J. Gallagher, Investigator.

FROM NEWSBOY TO LEGISLATOR

WHILE his father lay ill and unable to work, little Richard Fairbairn went out and sold newspapers at the Ludgate Hill railroad station, in the City of London. Later he hit upon employment in the distributing office of a London publication.

His father recovered health, and became secretary of the Lightermen and Watermen's Union, and the youngster assisted his father, taking part in debates when 16 years old. Improving as he went along, Richard became manager of tramways in London, and after a time at Worcester. Here the townspeople admired his eloquence and his honesty of purpose to such an extent that today the Member of Parliament for that borough is Richard Fairbairn.

Where and How To Live

HAVE you ever considered this question in a serious way? Or do you continue to keep house because you haven't thought of the advantages of a residential hotel as exemplified by the GREYSTONE?

If you live in a modern housekeeping apartment the GREYSTONE resembles the home you now occupy, except that you do not have to worry about the housekeeping. GREYSTONE employees do that under the supervision of critical management.

The GREYSTONE is the right answer to the how and where to live question. It eliminates the servant problem, and the search for quarters for a small family or individual. It supplies longed for luxury and convenience without extravagance.

We should like to show you the building any day between nine in the morning and ten in the evening. You may walk from suite to suite, on any floor, and choose the one you prefer. It may comprise one or more rooms. Leases should be signed now for immediate or future possession.

RUNAWAY MARRIED FOLK LOSE MATES BY NEW LAW

Court May Rule They Are "Presumed to Be Dead" if Nothing Has Been Heard of Them—But Life Insurance Policies Will Not Be Paid on This Evidence.

THE Appellate Division of the Supreme Court upheld the so-called "Enoch Arden law" of 1922, which makes it possible for the court in its discretion to dissolve a marriage where one member of the contract has been absent for five years without letting the other member of the contract know of his whereabouts. According to technical parlance, "presumed to be dead."

"This recent decision," said one lawyer, "will result in making it easier for future applicants who want their marriages annulled, and it may increase the number of applicants, but each case will have to be decided on its own merits. The procedure will be the same in case of a second marriage as it was before this recent ruling."

As early as 1834 the question arose of the legality of second marriages where a contracting party of a first marriage could not be found. Law books are full of cases where the first husband, long thought dead, appeared after several children were born of a second marriage, and insisting upon the dissolution of the second marriage, making the children of that marriage illegitimate. Under the new law, it is said, there will be small possibility of this complication.

There have been few instances of modern Enock Ardens who were as unselfish as the Enoch of Tennyson's poem, which tells of a sailor's journey to far lands, leaving behind his little family:

There Enoch traded for himself, and bought
Quaint monsters for the market of those times,
A gilded dragon for the babes.

But on the homeward trip Enoch's ship went to pieces and he found himself on an island, where he lived for years before he was able to attract a passing boat. When he finally got back to those babes for whom he had bought the gilded dragon, they were as tall as he and their mother had given them another father. The family was a happy one, and Enoch could not bring himself to spoil the picture he saw through a lighted window the night of his return. He went sadly away from that lighted window and died soon afterward. The Enoch Arden theme has been used by many novelists. Somerset Maugham turned to it in one of his South Sea Island stories and Guy de Maupassant used an adaptation in "The Homecoming."

According to hardheaded lawyers the chances are that where money and estates are concerned the average man will, if he can, insist upon a resumption of the marriage relation. Men seem to be the chief offenders in this social condition, which has brought about the new legislation. There are few records of female Enoch Ardens.

Under the Domestic Relations law of New York, March, 1922, "a party to a marriage may present to the Supreme Court a duly verified petition showing that the husband or wife of such party has absented himself or herself for five successive years then last past without being known to such party to be living during that time; that such party believes such husband or wife to be dead; and that a diligent search has been made to discover evidence showing that such husband or wife is living, and no such evidence has been found. The court shall thereupon by order require notice of the presentation and object of such petition to be published in the same manner as required for the publication of a summons in an action in the Supreme Court where service of such summons is made by publication; such notice shall be directed to the husband or wife who has so absented himself or herself and shall state the time and place of the hearing upon such petition, which time shall be not less than twenty days after the completion of the publication of such notice; and if the court, after the filing of proof of the proper publication of said notice and after hearing and proof taken, is satisfied of the truth of all the allegations contained in the petition, it may make an order dissolving such marriage."

A member of the District Attorney's staff said that there were few people who did not conform to the usual procedure, according to their records. It is customary in applying for the dissolution of a marriage for a person to present affidavits of friends who had known the couple when they were last living together. The Corporation Counsel then publishes a notice in the daily papers asking the whereabouts of the missing husband or wife and allows sufficient time to insure an answer. If, at the end of a specified time, there has been no word from the missing spouse, this is considered another link in the chain of evidence required when asking for annulment. Although one Supreme Court Justice refused to grant a dissolution of a marriage contract in a recent case, on an appeal the Appellate Division unanimously upheld the findings in the case and stated that the missing husband might, on the evidence, be "presumed to be dead." According to lawyers this test case has established an important precedent and will tend to make the "Enoch Arden" statute constitutional.

The new ruling will not, according to counsel for the New York Life Insurance Company, affect in any way the payment of life policies, as the fact the court held, under the Enoch Arden law, that a man was "presumed to be dead" would not in their opinion constitute sufficient proof of his death.

The Woman, Traveling, and her Money

That something will happen to her money, that she may lose it, or that it may be stolen—or, in foreign countries, that she may not get its full American value—is a constant worry to most women when traveling.

The woman who has traveled much at home or abroad has learned, from experience, to free herself absolutely from this worry about her funds. Before she starts on any journey she changes her money into

American Express Travelers Cheques

Acceptable everywhere—spendable anywhere, American Express Travelers Cheques are the insured money of all nations. They are as necessary at a local summer resort as in strange and distant lands.

Carrying American Express Travelers Cheques, she commands the world-wide service of this company's international organization with its offices in the principal cities and personal representatives everywhere.

This service is as varied as it is helpful and complete. With it, and under its guiding and efficient protection, a woman may travel alone anywhere and feel as comfortable as at home.

American Express Travelers Cheques come in a small leather container and are most convenient and handy to use. They carry with them wonderful peace of mind to the woman in traveling.

As an additional safeguard, and for greater convenience, use the $250 and $500 American Express Travelers Cheque Exchange Orders. These Orders are convertible into regular Travelers Cheques of smaller denominations without extra cost at American Express offices.

For sale at your bank or Express offices

ALBERT BALLIN

NEW YORK to HAMBURG

via Southampton

First Sailing . . July 26

Later Sailings . . Sept. 6, Oct. 18

The Hamburg-American Line, when planning this magnificent vessel, drew upon their long experience as the builders of the world's greatest ocean liners, in order to achieve the highest in beauty comfort and efficiency. Among other important mechanical features is a new stabilizing device which is an advance on anything yet applied to merchant ships.

The Albert Ballin is an oilburner of 22,000 gross tons, and carries first, second and third class passengers. Her facilities for the traveler's convenience and pleasure include spacious social parlors, smoking room, grill room, children's room, verandah cafe, gymnasium, elevators, suites and staterooms designed and equipped in the most modern manner. The world-famous Hamburg-American service and cuisine need no introduction.

The Albert Ballin is the latest addition to the joint service maintained by the United American Lines and the Hamburg-American Line. Sailings are from Pier 86, North River, New York, near railway terminals and hotels.

Monument to Samuel de Champlain founder of Quebec; on Dufferin Terrace, overlooking the St. Lawrence

A voyage to Old Quebec, and on to the stupendous gorge of the Saguenay River, is an experience unforgettable. Thousands have thrilled with delight at its scenic splendors no less than its historic associations. Every American should see Quebec—mistress of the broad, blue highway of the St. Lawrence; "The Greatest River Without Comparison That Is Known to Have Ever Been Seen." Thus wrote Jacques Cartier to the King of France, nearly four hundred years ago. You can begin your journey at Niagara Falls, Toronto, Rochester, Alexandria Bay, Clayton, Montreal or Quebec, and return the same way; arranging your trip so as to stop off a day at the important points without having to worry about hotel accommodations.

DEFENDS MIND TEST IN CHILD TRAINING

California Educator Explains Controversial Points as to Its Merits.

DIFFER ON TECHNICALITIES

No Fundamental Basis for Disagreement Among Teachers, Says Research Director.

THERE has been so much controversy about mental tests, or intelligence tests, that many school teachers are in doubt as to "what to believe, whom to believe, what to do or what not to do in the field of tests and measurements," says Virgil E. Dickson, Director of the Bureau of Research and Guidance of Oakland and Berkeley, Cal. In The Journal of the National Education Association he defines these tests for the benefit of the teacher.

"Any movement that has grown so rapidly and that affects so many people is bound to have its ardent supporters who will make extravagant statements about the nature and use of the tests," this official says.

"Likewise, there will be opponents who will be so vigorous that they fail to see or to admit that which is useful. Many of these teachers have had little training to guide them in the most effective use of such tools. They want to know the facts as nearly as facts can be determined as to what help they may secure from tests and what pitfalls to avoid.

"The teacher should keep in mind the two general classes of tests. The first class, comonly known as accomplishment tests, is designed to measure what a pupil has learned and can do in such subjects as reading, writing, spelling, arithmetic, &c. Such tests are merely carefully planned sets of examinations such as teachers have always been accustomed to give. Their chief value lies in the fact that they have been given to many other children and that there are results available by which one child may be compared with another of any particular age or school grade. We shall not discuss further this class of tests in this article.

"The second class is commonly known as mental or intelligence tests. These are designed to measure the child's power to learn as distinguished from what he has learned.

Questions Behind Tests.

"The main controversy comes largely from such questions as: Do these tests measure native endowment or do they measure learning? Do they measure general intelligence or only one phase of intelligence? Should a person be said to have low intelligence when he cannot do the ordinary school work required in upper grades or in high school, but who goes out into industrial or commercial life and succeeds in competition with his fellows? Should any person be characterized as having superior or inferior intelligence as a result of his performance in the so-called intelligence tests?

"The recent articles by Bagley, Terman, Lippman and others, while strongly controversial, nevertheless all point in one direction, namely, that the tests have some use. One person would not label them 'intelligence tests,' but would call them 'classification tests.' Another sees a danger to our ideals of democracy through a development of castes or classes formed on the basis of mental tests.

"While the average classroom teacher should be and is interested in the definition of intelligence, while she would like to know whether these tests measure original endowment, skill in learning particular branches, or acquired powers, she is much more interested in knowing just what she may safely attempt to do and what she should not attempt to do with these mental tests. She wants something that will help her to understand better the nature and ability or present condition of each child and something that will enable her to know better how to teach him. She has a feeling that these tests will help her. Every writer on the subject admits that the tests have a practical use if properly handled and interpreted. It should be the object, therefore, of the large majority of teachers to advance as far as they may with safety and with profit in the use of tests and to watch the progress of scientific experimentation in order to know when they may make further advancement with safety.

Two Types of Mental Tests.

"There are two types of intelligence tests in common use in the schools: (1) The individual test, (2) the group test. The individual test is given by an examiner to only one child at a time. It consists of a series of questions or problems which have been arranged in order of difficulty or which have been assigned certain values as determined by experiment. These problems are designed to explore a number of functions or processes of the mind, such as reasoning, thinking, comparing, judging. Standards or norms have been established so that any performance or success may be compared with that which is the average or characteristic of a particular age. For example, if a child earns a score that is the norm for 7-year-old children, his mental behaviour, so far as these problems are concerned, is comparable to that of a 7-year-old child. If the child is 5 years old his performance is two years above that normal to his age. If he is 10 years old his performance is three years below that which is the average for his age. Thus the test furnishes a means of comparing the performance of a child with that which is standard for his age.

"The group mental test is designed for exactly the same purpose as the individual mental test, except that it may be given to a group of ten, fifty, or even a hundred, people at once, each person designating his answers in a booklet which can later be graded or scored just as any other examination paper is scored. The main advantage of the group test is that it can be given to a large number of children in a short time and at a total cost far less than is necessary for individual testing. It has a disadvantage in that the result for any particular child is less reliable than the result of the individual test. This disadvantage may be met, at least partially, by giving two or more group tests at different times during the year and comparing the results. It is highly desirable to have a cumulative record for each school child showing the result of a group mental test for each year from the third grade up.

Tests Are Trustworthy.

"Every classroom teacher and every school administrator should be thoroughly interested in the movement of tests and measurements, and each should study to know how to use tests in order to make better classification and better instruction possible to those children entrusted to his care.

"No teacher doubts that children differ in their ability to learn. Mental tests of school children differentiate those children who can do well from those who cannot do well in the ordinary classroom work of the elementary school or the high school. The test furnishes trustworthy evidence to supplement the teacher's judgment and makes possible a more accurate assignment to each child of tasks proportioned to his ability. The teacher, then, should not be alarmed over the controversy about tests. Upon analysis the contention will usually be found to centre about the use of technical terms or about radical claims with reference to what can or cannot be done with tests."

SECRETS OF THE RUM FLEET AND ITS FREEBOOTERS

Bring In Less Than One Per Cent. Of Former Supply, Says Commissioner Haynes

Underwriting Smuggled Cargoes Newest Chapter In Flow Of Gold To Bahamas

The New Freebooter

Some of the secrets of the rum fleet are disclosed today by Commissioner Haynes. The ninth chapter, to appear tomorrow, tells of the liquor export traffic in the Bahamas. The complete narrative consists of forty-three instalments, to be published every day until Aug. 26.

PROHIBITION INSIDE OUT
Eighth Instalment

By ROY A. HAYNES,
U. S. Prohibition Commissioner.

MANY a chapter of adventure, stirring in its appeal to the imagination, has been written of the "rum fleet" plying chiefly from Bahama ports to mysterious destinations along the Atlantic seaboard of the United States. The subject has provided fantastic material for the picture writers of great metropolitan papers. It smacks of the old days of the Spanish Main, of pirate daring and the lure of the sea, strong in most men from boyhood.

There is an air about the swaggering freebooters of old that has given them a special niche in literature. Many a gray-headed business man still reads of them with quickening pulse. And the thrilling tales of the rum runners off the Atlantic Coast have touched that same chord.

It was a new thing when the "rum fleet" was first heralded as rocking at anchor outside the three-mile limit off the Jersey coast. There was an impudent daring about the proceeding that sent the story booming over the wires to newspaper front pages everywhere. The "wets" chortled with glee. They foresaw a difficult task for the Government in finding means to plug this leak that seemed so big.

What they did not realize, or would not, was that, even stretched to the utmost limit of possibility, this was no more than a mere leak. In the actual amounts of illicitly transported liquor it brought to our shores it was as the dregs in the glass when compared with what we normally consumed prior to the enactment of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Rum Running and Propaganda.

There is only one way in which the "rum fleet" and the chronicle of its doings day by day have had a serious effect. That lies in the stimulus it has given propaganda to befool the nation into believing prohibition enforcement is a hollow sham and a mere mockery. "Smuggled liquor" was promptly capitalized by bootleggers peddling dangerous concoctions under faked labels. They shouted, even in remote corners, that their stuff was genuine, direct from British distilleries via Nassau.

The publicity given to the "rum fleet" has been a blessing to the poison-peddlers, against whom every man's hand is raised, whether he be "wet" or "dry." It has aided the most despicable phase of bootlegging in areas so far from the sea that never a drop of liquor actually smuggled has ever reached them.

When all is said and done, what is the truth about smuggled liquor? It is not difficult to find the answer. The greatest possible measure of the traffic is written in the official records of Great Britain, France, Cuba and other nations which are the only source of supply for the smuggling traffic.

Assume, if you will, that all of the liquor exported by all of these countries into all ports from which smuggling is physically possible actually was smuggled into the United States.

If that impossible situation were to be the truth, the United States would get from smugglers less than 1 per cent. of the amount of liquor she drank prior to prohibition. Specifically, the figure would be two-thirds of 1 per cent.

In effect, the official export records of foreign countries show that prohibition enforcement in the United States, so far as genuine foreign-made liquor is concerned, is as rigid as the Volstead act itself. It has cut consumption to one-half of 1 per cent. by volume or less.

Unfortunately, it is not alone with genuine liquors we have to deal, even in the smuggling trade. "Doctored booze" also comes in from the Bahamas. There are in our files confidential reports to prove this. And there are also the records of the police in many coastal cities in accounting for mysterious deaths.

Just before prohibition became effective there was a rush of export liquor to Canada, the Bahamas and many other points outside American jurisdiction. No one who read the papers during those days could forget the printed stories of liquor dumped out on the shore for lack of storage facilities. It was destined by its rightful owners to be held until an early day—to which they looked hopefully—when the Volstead act should be declared unconstitutional. Then it was to be rushed back for sale at famine prices. For its ultimate smuggling should the courts prove unkindly to "wet" hopes there were only the vaguest ideas. The "wets" could not believe that prohibition had come to stay.

Much of this supply has trickled back. Most of it has disappeared; and such little American-made whisky as does come in more often than not is "doctored" beyond recognition and has been diluted to double or treble its former volume. The bootleg market for it has waned for months. The man who craves liquor so badly as to pay $8 or $10 or $12 a bottle for it wants a "kick" in his costly drink. He has little patience with watered stuff. And dread of poisoned adulterations makes him gun-shy of the old, well-known American brands.

This dread of deleterious liquor and the tightening up of restrictions around our own remaining stores of pre-prohibition liquors account very largely for the enormous increase in importations from England to such places as the Bahamas. There have been instances recently where as many as 100,000 cases a week have been contracted for by merchants in the island ports. The only possible outlet for that whisky flood is the smuggling trade.

From England to West Indies.

Among British officials there is no effort to deny this. Witness a dispatch recently widely circulated in American papers, quoting Sir Harry Edward Spiller Cordeaux, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Bahama Islands, as having said in Montreal that the healthy condition of the islands' finances was largely due to its liquor traffic. That condition was most strongly reflected in the recent £250,000 expenditure for harbor improvements at Nassau, the Governor was quoted as saying.

Or, again, the following Associated Press cablegram from London:

"Practically the whole of the large increase in imports of wine and spirits into the Bahamas last year was due to prohibition in America. Mr. Ormsby-Gore, Under-Secretary of the Colonial Office, told a questioner in the House of Commons.

"Commander Kenworthy, Independent Liberal member for Hull, raised a laugh with the suggestion that for the sake of friendship with America these colonies be rationed. Mr. Ormsby-Gore said he certainly would not interfere with British trade. 'If we prohibited it they would go to Haiti or some other convenient island belonging to another nation,' he added.

"The Under-Secretary stated that imports of wine into the Bahamas in 1922 totaled £27,260 in value and spirits just over £1,000,000, whereas in 1918 they were £8,675 and £6,370, respectively."

The reaction of officials of the Bahama Government is a natural one. Liquor importations there are legal, and there is a duty collected of about $7.60 a case.

It is no wonder that the huge increase in liquor importations which began in 1921 is credited with having paid off long ago the outstanding indebtedness of the islands. The law-defying American patrons of rum smugglers have made the colony a present of that sum, and piled up fortunes besides for men in the islands who have no scruples against this phase of the traffic.

There is a point overlooked in the statement attributed to Governor Cordeaux. That is the outstanding fact in all the records of American prohibition enforcement that rum smuggling, narcotic smuggling, evasion of immigration laws and diamond smuggling run hand in hand.

A recent illustration of this kinship in smuggling is disclosed in the case of the sloop Mary Beatrice. She rolled into "Rum Row" one June day, some three or four weeks out of Havana, with a cargo of human contraband aboard—fifteen Chinese who had paid the skipper to land them on our forbidden shore. And there she lay and rolled while the skipper fled and crew and human cargo fought. Twin sister she was to the rum runner.

The "rum fleet" itself is a curious flotilla. A former Spanish cruiser, once pride of the fleets of the haughty Dons, has been spotted among them. The one-time palatial yacht of a noted American industrial captain has flashed her dainty heels back and forth in the new brotherhood of the coast, keeping company with blunt-nosed and weather-beaten old fishing schooners from the Grand Banks. Smaller craft, made glorious in the war through the daring of Yankee tars who manned them, have joined this pack of sea vermin preying on the self-respect and decency of a people.

It is estimated from reports at hand that fifty-three vessels with an aggregate of more than 5,000 tons register operated out of the Bahamas alone in 1922. What may have been the aggregate of genuine liquor dumped on our shores no man can say. It could not have exceeded, however, the aggregate of liquors imported by the islands during that year or already in storage there.

We have accurate records of these new freebooters. We know the history of the ships, of their captains, and in many cases of the men who engineer the operations and frequently travel as super-cargoes on smuggling voyages. Our files form a veritable "Who's Who in Rum Row." Many of these master smugglers are of American birth. The skippers of these lawless fleets are drawn chiefly from the scum of American waterfronts.

But their crews are largely recruited among the sponging flotillas of the Bahamas, and in their veins, beyond doubt, run traces of the blood of old master pirates of the Spanish Main. These are seamen unexcelled, born and reared in the hard ways of blue water. It is in their blood to risk life in dark adventures on the deep.

Let me quote in substance from one of a long series of reports in our files, received from confidential agents sent to the Bahamas. He was writing of a schooner that had sailed from Nassau with 17,000 cases of whisky aboard:

"There are thirty-four shippers interested in this cargo, which is valued at over $1,000,000," he wrote. "It would surprise you to know the number of men among them who are members of the Government here or merchants other than liquor dealers, and who have been lured into the deal through the chance of enormous profits from comparatively small investments. Even women are investing in these big combines.

"They have an underwriting scheme which induces such gambling. It works this way: If you are known by a local liquor importer, he will trust you for as many cases as you care to gamble on at the price of $5 a case, which is the established underwriter's fee. You pay him the cost price per case when the vessel returns with your money.

"The boys here are fast becoming millionaires through this new gamble. They send their own representatives as supercargoes to handle the cash. When the ship is sold out up there, these men usually are set ashore and return here by regular steamer.

"One of the largest operators along the Atlantic seaboard is here now. He owns about five vessels. Some are now loading. He is under bond for violation of the liquor laws, but does not seem to mind that. He is reported to have cleared $200,000 in the last few months."

I am impelled to revert for a moment to the question of "doped" liquors made in America which mingle in the smuggled "wet goods" coming in from the Bahamas. I have before me a recent editorial comment in a Bahaman paper prompted by the visit of certain American officials to Nassau. It illustrates, to my mind, the gradual awakening of that public opinion to which I look as one means of solution of the international and perplexing problem we face in dealing with rum smugglers.

The editor assumed that the American officials whose visit he reported (they were prohibition officials) had to do in part with the trailing of "drums of cheap sugar waste alcohol" from Cuba to Nassau and thence to the United States via the rum fleet. His virtuous distinction between "honest products" and the "vile new alcoholic by-product of the sugar mill" is sharp. His defense of the right under British law and trade conventions to ship "honest products to all who may demand and pay for them" on the one hand, and his condemnation of the traffic in the Cuban "threepenny alcohol by-product" on the other, also is emphatic.

"The honest whisky label," the editorial continues, "covering alcoholic poison, plays into the calculations of every rabid prohibition crank with a tremendous effectiveness which the honest officer of the law of any country cannot ignore. The new threepenny alcoholic by-product of Cuban sugar manufacture labeled as honest drink is an imposition unpardonable in the ethics of life. Its condemnation is as reasonable by international convention as that of dope of any known sort. It is as bad as opium or heroin."

There is another phase of smuggling with which British fair-mindedness should deal in defense of British traditions and institutions, if for no deeper reason. That is the double clearance papers for a "foe."

The way the thing has been worked was this: The vessel owner or skipper applied for and obtained clearance for a Canadian or other northern British or French port with cargo. There were no formalities required, aside from his manifest to show liquor in that cargo. There is no rebate of duty in the colony on imported liquor re-exported. That duty, paid on arrival of shipments from Europe, goes into the colonial treasury.

Having obtained this clearance showing him en route with cargo from one British colonial port to another, the smuggler went out and loafed about town a few days. Probably he began loading up with the cargo destined to be "run" on our coast.

After a fair period had passed, he reappeared to ask for clearance "in ballast" to an American port. His previous cargo, he explained, had been discharged. The official issuing clearance papers gravely accepted this statement and made out the new documents.

Showing an "Innocent Voyage."

So the rum ship put to sea, ready for all emergencies and with few risks involved to the gambling ring interested in her cargo. If overhauled at sea, she could present perfectly regular papers showing this to be an "innocent voyage" between two foreign ports with innocent cargo, including, mostly, if not entirely, liquor. She could not be apprehended or interfered with. The British flag and the international practice of centuries protected her, however certain it might be that her real purpose was to shatter American laws.

Once the rendezvous was reached and the liquor all put overside at sea, beyond American jurisdiction, to be sneaked ashore by waiting small craft, the rum ship changed character and boldly sailed into an American port to restock and refuel. She produced the duplicate clearance papers to prove that she had sailed without cargo from the Bahamas for the port she was making and still was an innocent toiler of the sea. There was no ground for her seizure, whatever well-grounded suspicion rested against her.

British officials have said such abuses as these would be looked into. Perhaps they have been checked. At least, more recently our reports show that the rum ships are taking aboard their fuel and stores at sea to a large extent, making ready for the return trip. There is a regular industry among the bootlegger rings along the coast to supply those vessels.

Tied down as prohibition enforcement activities are by law and regulation and international practice to the narrow confines of the three-mile limit, we lack the means to check up on the double clearance paper traffic. We can only surmise what it is still possible to do as indicated in our confidential reports from the Bahamas.

Traffic Made by Prohibition.

It is noteworthy that prior to American prohibition there was practically no liquor traffic between such points as St. Pierre, Miquelon, and the Bahamas, either way. Since prohibition an enormous traffic has grown up on those routes.

Within the last few months I have seen an official report showing two steamers en route from St. Pierre to Nassau and touching at Halifax for coal. One carried 10,000 cases of whisky, the other 14,000. They touched at Halifax during the same week.

That whisky, 24,000 cases of it, undoubtedly was destined for the bootleg traffic in the United States. Whether it went first to Nassau and thence back via the "rum fleet," or was transshipped off our coast without passing through the Nassau "booze" clearing house at all, I am not informed.

On the face of it, these are legitimate voyages. No one can question either ships or cargo so long as they remain outside our three-mile limit. But there is no reason of navigation or seamanship that would bring them within 100 miles of our coast in making the voyage. When they do come close in there appears to be only one reason for their coming.

While Nassau of the Bahamas has been commonly turned the "Isle of Rum," St. Pierre of the Miquelons has been styled the "Isle of Champagne," as most of its importations are liquors and wine of French origin.

Recently a leading American publication sent two investigators into St. Pierre to make an investigation, which investigation resulted in a series of articles in that publication which told how the last French colony in the Western Hemisphere has become rich from selling liquor to the United States rum-carrying schooners of Nova Scotia and New England ports.

Surely it is not supposed for a moment that British authority in the Bahamas, French authority in St. Pierre, Miquelon, or Cuban authority in the Pearl of the Antilles, for instance, would tolerate irregularities on the part of officials in these various bases of smuggling activities. The temptations in the way of some colonial officials must be very great. They are only another proof of the endless chain of evil that follows along with this rum-smuggling business to the intimate grief of mankind.

BUTCH'S GOLD KNOBS LET IN 'DRY' SLEUTHS

BOOTLEG PALACE SEIZED

King of Beer Runners Spent Lavishly in His Own Town

EVEN BOUGHT A NEWSPAPER

By HELEN BULLITT LOWRY.

LAWRENCE CROWLEY of Joliet, Ill., who suddenly became notorious from coast to coast as the Beer Runner King who purchased gold door knobs for his bootleg palace, is in trouble today with prohibition enforcement officers and income tax collectors. And all because he insisted on doing his little stunt in his own home town.

If he could only have yearned to drive his new Pierce-Arrow down some other road than his own Main Street—he, who had so lately hauled cab fares along that same thoroughfare! If he could have got his "kick" out of sporting his platinum watch fob and diamond-studded watch and four-carat ring in any other town on the map than in Joliet! If those gold door knobs had been ordered in Chicago instead of at the counter of the gossiping local hardware dealer!

In short, if he could only have seen Joliet with the cynical eyes of the traveling salesman—seen that its department stores, its public library, its "best families," its some 50,000 other inhabitants, its Commercial Club and its quick lunch counters, appear in triplicate in every corner of Illinois and Indiana and Ohio! Then "Butch," as he is called in Joliet, would not be in trouble today.

As it is, the world is being treated to as good a laugh as has yet issued out of the Volstead tangle. The Federal Government has put a lien on a man's real property to collect an income tax of some two or three hundred thousand dollars, on an income which it claims has been made by breaking that same Federal Government's own Eighteenth Amendment.

A new prohibition enforcement agency has thus come dramatically into the game—even if, in the very nature of things, it straightway kills the goose that lays the golden egg. Since the lien was clamped on Crowley's privately owned real estate the prohibition officers have taken up the business activities of this gentleman from Joliet seriously. He has been served with a warrant and is awaiting trial.

Rise of the Dog Catcher's Son.

The story of Lawrence Crowley is as good a Cinderella yarn as ever was released from Hollywood. Thirty years ago a tow-headed, unkempt urchin, son of the Joliet dog catcher. Three years ago a "middlin'" good garage mechanic and cabman. Two years ago a hired man in the ranks of the prohibition trade, arrested one fine night and fined for driving a truck of somebody else's beer kegs—a mere cog in the mighty bootleg machinery.

Today a millionaire, buying three Cadillacs, one Pierce-Arrow and one Locomobile in a single season, to say nothing of diamonds and gold door knobs. Today the Beer Runner King—at least by courtesy, although he has not really received that title by the slow and due processes of law and trials.

Everything in standardized parts so far, you say. Aren't there scores of got-rich-since-prohibition gentlemen in every flashy restaurant in New York or Chicago or St. Louis or San Francisco, sporting diamond rings on their necktie and expensive chorus blonds on their arms? Prohibition in all of its ramifications has been the backbone of the restaurant and the imported car business. Our hero's taste in interior and exterior decorations seems like that of any other gentleman of fortune of the watter professions.

But at this point Butch ceases to be standardized and becomes instead a yearning human being—a rosy-cheeked, mild-mannered, blue-eyed little young man in a nifty gray suit.

Beer kings as a species have been content to do their flashing and buying incognito in our larger centres of civilization. If a man plied his trade in Philadelphia, he patronized the jewelers of Gotham. If his beat were Sauk Centre, he went to Minneapolis for his spending. Theirs the sorry triumph of flashing it over the unknown waiter or the totally strange salesman of silk shirts. Play the poor bootlegger. His life is a lonely one—never getting to show off where he would really have fun out of it. Our wiser bootleg kings hardly keep a bank account, much less a homestead.

Bosch Patronized Home Industry.

But some irresistible urge—biological maybe—dogs inside of Lawrence Crowley made him want to display his new wealth to the one little town in the world where he had been the least of its citizens. He wanted to be somebody where he had been nobody. Maybe he had been reading success stories in the monthly magazines.

Followed that orgy of extravagance that culminated in bringing him under the watchful eye of the income tax sputter. Here are some of his splurges as the good Joliet gossips narrate them:

A fourteen-room mansion on the most fashionable boulevard of the city, cut among the "best families." A thousand dollar tip to the priest for marrying him. A fleet of high priced pleasure cars. A coffin costing $1,500 for his mother, and a $35,000 monument to mark her resting place. The garage where he once worked as humble mechanic. A habit of matching thousand-dollar bills with an alien prospering associate as a bet on the bill's serial number. A quainter habit still of carrying $20,000 around with him and jauntily displaying it.

And a whole newspaper. The Joliet Times, in which paper appeared editorials signed by "Lawrence Crowley," in the very best English available in the local market, though the vocabulary did not sound like Butch's.

Next followed an attack—almost to purchase a foothold in Joliet's social world—that is, the Rotary Club section of it. They tell the tale around Joliet that Crowley applied for membership in the Commercial Club, which in this town of some fifty thousand is more than an organization that puts up synthetic "Welcome to Joliet" signs on the highways. It is the downtown loafing place for the more dignified business men. The tale goes that he was blackballed.

But Butch, the garage mechanic that was, the plutocrat that is, promptly turned around and bought the business block in which the Commercial Club rents rooms. The club, though a good tenant, has received orders to vacate. A new idea in social procedure. If a club blackballs you, fire it.

Meanwhile the town was remembering the garage mechanic. Some people remembered even further back than that—far back of the fourteen-room mansion to the three-room cottage and to the father, a well-liked old Irish policeman who had the job of rounding up all the dogs who had not been licensed. Some even declare that they can remember a little insignificant youngster who used to keep warm on cold Illinois nights by huddling close to three or four dogs—whether the dogs were authentically licensed or merely accumulated in the paternal line of duty, tradition fails to narrate. Mr. Lawrence Crowley today has four bloodied police dogs on his Raynor Avenue estate which are allowed the run of the house and the Oriental rugs.

The years pass. Somewhere in this decade Lawrence became Butch, nobody knows just why or when. Maybe the sausage end of the dog catcher trade had something to do with his title. Anyway, when next he is remembered in the annals of Joliet, he was one of those seventeen-year-old boys that do odd jobs and lean against lamp-posts and pool-room doors. The records are scanty about "unimportant people."

He bobs up again some five years later as the middlin' good mechanic, taking an interest in ward politics in a small-time way—what is known technically in the political profession as a third or fourth grade ward-healer. A little blond, blue-eyed young chap that people said "Hello, Butch," to.

Then suddenly the metamorphosis. The new pale gray suits and the four-carat diamonds. The lively taste in interior decorations that made him order that the roses on his wallpaper should climb all over the ceiling because he liked them that way, even if other people did have their ceilings plain.

That is why the good gossips of Joliet, the income tax collector, as well as the prohibition officers, are trying to fit this Lawrence Crowley into the pattern of the bear running industry which has made the cement road from Joliet to Chicago as dangerous as the erstwhile highwaymen-infested roads of Old England in the sixteenth century.

Dirty Work at Illinois Crossroads.

Somehow beer running has a jovial ring to it. One hardly expects the ruthless cruelty of the men who have placed their bloody stamp on the whisky trails throughout the country. Murder and high-jackers have made the greased trails that run from the brewery towns of Northern Illinois into thirsty Chicago a place of dreadful night. After midnight has struck, the powers of darkness and of beer running take over the road.

For it would seem that men kill as blithely for a truckload of beer as for a truckload of whisky. Two weeks ago the body of a man was found, head and hands chopped off and charred, as if to destroy all identification. Two months ago a wounded man was delivered, like a waif baby, on the steps of the Joliet Hospital. Stubbornly, at the point of death, and later throughout his convalescence, he carried the secret of the battle of the road in which he received his wound.

Nor is he the only wounded man who has been left in the dead of night on the hospital doorstep. One week ago two meat truck drivers were waylaid by high-jackers, on the presumption, of course, that their truck held beer. One of those drivers lies wounded today, shot through the shoulder.

The northern section of Illinois is teeming with breweries, running as licensed producers of near beer. That's the catch in it. To make legal beer you have to make real beer first. Then the excess baggage of illegal alcohol is extracted—if ever. So what is the use of raiding a brewery? Any truckload of beer seized within the premises is valueless as evidence. That's where the beer business has it on the whisky.

Indeed, the business is so widely diffused and so easy that only by courtesy can we call Butch Crowley a Beer King. There is too much competition. He will have to be content to rank as a kinglet. No one beer king has the whole territory sewed up. Instead, every brewery town has its little clique of bootleg gentry; they hang out around a fruit stand or a poolroom or a garage, living quiet lives at home and flashing their diamonds in Chicago.

Lawrence Crowley stands alone as the boy who obeyed the home-sweet-home impulse and did his showing off where all of us prefer to do it. And that is why Mrs. Mabel Reineke, the young Collector of Internal Revenue for the Chicago district, has received orders from Washington to clamp a lien on the real property that was to have made Butch Crowley into a solid citizen.

MARCONI'S DREAM OF EMPIRE.

TWELVE months are expected to elapse before Marconi, having obtained all the necessary licenses, will link, not merely the British Empire, but the whole world, by radiogram. From the south and west of the British Islands he already covers 2,200 miles between England and New York, and is likewise in daily touch with Glace Bay (1,900 miles) and with Montreal (3,700 miles).

He is extending from Montreal to Winnipeg, Edmonton and Vancouver, and thence to Pekin (4,600 miles) and to Melbourne (7,200 miles). Another route designed is via Azores, Madeira and Cape Verde, to Buenos Aires and thence to Punta Arenas, adjacent to Cape Horn.

There is another line, from Great Britain to Cape Town, joining South Africa with Nairobi (Kenya Colony), and proceeding to Madras, Rangoon (Burmah) and Hongkong. It is declared that when these wireless lines are complete every portion of the British Empire will be in communicative touch with every other State and colony.

SLIPPING THE LARIAT OVER

BY WILL ROGERS

WELL, I see by this morning's papers that our old friend, Mr. Gary of the Steel Trust, after much letter writing and persuasion from President Harding, has sent a letter to the President which he received the day before he started mushing his way over the Dawson Trail to that Gold cursed land near the Pole. Well, in the letter he promised the President that he would do away with the 12-hour-a-day work in the Steel Mills (just as soon as it could be arranged). He said in the letter that it would take some time to arrange it.

Now, he promised the President to do this, but you know, so many Republicans have promised him things since he has been in and then didn't make good that it is getting so that a Republican promise is not much more to be depended on than a Democratic one. And that has always been considered the lowest form of collateral in the world.

Now Mr. Gary says it will take time. You see, a man who has been working for years for 12 or 14 hours a day, and you cut him down to 8, and you have a Physical wreck on your hands. You take a person who is used to the cool air of a Steel furnace for half the 24 hours of each day and bring him into the stuffy atmosphere of outdoors, or a home, and he can't stand it.

Well, the 4th of July just passed and 62 people passed with it, beside 262 wounded. A great many of the deaths were due to Gunshot wounds, some accidental, but most of them were from Roman Candles shooting from the wrong end. I wonder if it would not be just as easy for the Manufacturers of those things to make them shoot out of just one end. It looks to us ignorant like it would be easier.

Tricky Wives' Pistols.

After reading the casualty list every 5th of July morning, one learns that we have killed more people celebrating our Independence than we lost fighting for it. We would celebrate the ending of each of our Wars but we haven't got enough people to go around. Some of these affairs were caused by husbands trying to celebrate with their Wives' Pistols and didn't get the wives to show them how to properly do it.

Of course, the worst case of a Roman Candle going off at the wrong end on the 4th of July was when Dempsey picked up Tom Gibbons at Shelby, Montana. That was supposed to have been hand picked and prepared. Now, in searching for material to write about and asking advice as to what people would be interested in, quite a few would say, write about Shelby and the fight; that would be funny.

And I have heard lots of kidding about Shelby's failure to raise so much money. Now, I generally try to see the funny side of most of our National calamities, including Politics, but to save my soul I can't think of a funny thing about Shelby, Montana. They went into what they thought was a Sporting Proposition, but they soon found out that the only thing that was not connected with it was sport.

"Ever since, I think it was Noah's two boys, there has been conflict."

They wanted to do something to put their little Town on the map. They believed in it; they believed, contrary to New York and all the so-called experts, that Gibbons would make a creditable showing. They went out and spent their money as far as it went, and that's as far as any one can go.

Years ago, I remember a similar incident of a never-heard-of hustling little Town that was hardly known as far as the County line. It was located about 30 miles from where I was born and raised. They, like Shelby, wanted to do something that would attract attention to their little Town. This stunt I am going to tell about may not be new now, but I believe it was then. They hired a special train for 10 days and made a trip to what to us was back East, St. Louis, Indianapolis, Chicago and Kansas City.

The "Little Rope's" Debut.

It took just about all the town could raise, but every business man dug up all he could. They loaded the Baggage car with things their County would raise. The reason I remember this case so well was because I had the good fortune to be invited to go along, and it was one of the first cases of me and my little Rope making a Public appearance.

Well, it was a joke—a hundred men getting off a train, marching with a Band, a boosting a place nobody had ever heard of. But business men in the places we paraded commenced to realise that there must be something in our Town or we couldn't do all this.

Now, if you are anxious to know whatever became of this Tank town, it's Tulsa, Oklahoma, which would have been a real town, even if its people weren't greasy rich with Oil, for it is founded on the spirit of its people.

They plunged and they won. Shelby had the same spirit and lost. I can't become tickled at it, myself.

It's the Towns, big and small, that don't do or try to do anything at all that are funny to me. Personally, I think they made a bad selection of a mode of Publicity. People a prize fight would attract wouldn't settle in any town. They won't even stay in New York. So how was Shelby going to hold them?

The most pathetic part of this for this little Cow Town is to come yet. Through the fruits of their idea and financial failure, some so-called wise Eastern Promoter will reap a fortune by rematching these two men again. All reaped at the expense of Shelby's idea. More power to all the other Shelbys in the West who are trying.

Well, all I read in the papers now is about some fellow named Edward Bok offering 100 thousand dollars for some one to suggest a plan where they stop wars. Now he is receiving serious editorial mention for his idea and philanthropy. People that praise his idea laughed at Henry Ford's for trying to just stop one war, while this fellow offers just 100 thousand dollars to stop all of them.

I claim that both men were equally sincere, but, on the other hand, if there is to be ridicule, I claim they should share equally in that, too. The very terms of this make it ridiculous. He is to give half the money when the Trustees accept the plan, and the other half when the Senate accepts and passes it.

Now, I am no Philanthropist. I am hard to separate from money; if I killed two Birds with one stone I would want the stone back. But I will just raise Mr. Bok's offer 100 thousand dollars. I will hereby make a Bona Fide offer of 200 thousand dollars to any man in the World who can draw up any kind of a Bill or Suggestion, I don't care on what subject, no matter how meriterious, and send it to the Senate of the United States and send this paper a copy of the Bill submitted, and, if the United States Senate passes the bill as you sent it in, you get the 200 thousand.

Talk about stopping War, I will bet any man in the United States 5 thousand even that there ain't a man in this Country that can draw up a bill that the Senate themselves won't go to war over while they are arguing it.

Can you imagine the bunch of Multi-Millionaires made by the last war agreeing to stop all chances of a future war for 100 thousand dollars? I am only an ignorant Cowpuncher, but there ain't nobody on earth, I don't care how smart they are, ever going to make me believe they will ever stop wars.

We ain't as smart as the Generations ahead of us, and they tried to stop them and haven't been able to. In fact, every war has been preceded by a Peace Conference. That's what always starts the next war.

Ever since, I think it was Noah's two Boys, there has been conflict. Cain, I think it was, picked up an Oar and slew his Brother Abel so hard with it that he knocked out the side of the Zoo. I suppose a hundred thousand dollars would have stopped that. Why, a hundred thousand dollars couldn't even stop the Dempsey fight.

The only way to do is just stay out of them as long as you can, and the best way to stay out of them for quite a while, instead of teaching a Boy to run an Automobile, teach him to fly, because the Nation in the next war that ain't up in the Air, is just going to get something dropped on its Bean.

As I told you in an Article a few weeks ago, Mr. Harding has the plan, and by the way, I see on this trip he has suggested it several times again. His is better than any that will come in through this offer, and he should get the 100 thousand. And it is only a few words—that is, "Draft Capital as well as men." Any time you take everything that every man has got the same as you conscript Boys, there ain't going to be no war.

Now, I think you will agree that would be great, but you see if Congress passes it. If it does, I will give Mr. Harding the dough for getting his idea through. I say, IF Congress Passes It.

COMMUTING BY AIRPLANE AT 120 MILES AN HOUR

YOU can leave New York any Saturday noon this Summer and be ordering luncheon in Newport before 2 o'clock, or, if you can get away on Friday, you can have luncheon in New York and play golf or tennis in Newport the same afternoon. During the week you can run up to Manchester-by-the-Sea from New York and 150 minutes later drive off from the first tee at the Essex Country Club. Or from Newport you can leave a tee at the Casino and keep a dinner engagement in Southampton.

All of this not only can be done but is being done, and with less effort than it takes to write this. All that you need do is go to the foot of East Thirty-first Street, climb into an upholstered seat of an air yacht of the New York-Newport Air Service, stuff some cotton into your ears and ten minutes later you will know what a sea gull thinks of Long Island Sound.

There is a regular week-end aeroplane service between New York and Newport, while between times the planes are available for taxi service to virtually any Summer resort along the North Atlantic Coast or for trips up the Hudson to Lakes George and Champlain. The rates? To or from Newport on the regular runs, $30 a passenger, and 50 cents a mile for taxi service. The rate is about three times the cost of a trip by rail.

Every week-end from now until Labor Day three air yachts leave East Thirty-first Street for the Naval Training Station at Newport. Two planes leave Friday afternoon, one at 2:30 and the other at 3 o'clock, while the third taxis out into Greenpoint Bay to gather momentum for clearing the East River bridges Saturday noon. Returning, the planes leave Newport at 3 P. M. Sunday and at 9 and 9:30 Monday mornings. The scheduled flying time is 90 minutes, or an average of between 110 and 120 miles an hour.

After a Year's Careful Study.

A genuine desire to further aviation, generous purses and local pride are behind the Newport line, which has been launched without Government appropriation. The opening of the service is the result of over a year's careful study.

Situated at the end of a six hours' rail journey from New York, Newport has suffered from the growing prevalency of the Friday-to-Monday visits. A week-end in Southampton, say, entails less travel than to the Rhode Island Summer colony. A number of Newport colonists, including Vincent Astor and H. S. Vanderbilt, solved their individual difficulties by learning to fly and even commuting from New York. They made their seaplanes auxiliary to their motor cars, and the results of their ventures may be said to be the inspiration for the beginnings of a regular flying service between New York and Newport. Other wealthy Newportersa were approached. The Newport Chamber of Commerce was interested. Support was promised, and between the colonists and the Chamber of Commerce $50,000 was raised as a subsidy. Others stood ready to purchase blocks of tickets.

The subscribers included Robert Goelet, Arthur Curtiss James, Henry Walters, James B. Duke, Oliver Gould Jennings, Mrs. Vanderbilt, Henry A. C. Taylor, Stuart Duncan, H. Barton Jacobs, Bradford Norman, Mrs. G. H. P. Belmont, Grafton Cushing, Mrs. Hugh Auchincloss, John Aspegren, George Widener, I. Townsend Burden, Clarence Pell, William Fahnestock, Mrs. Frederick Pearson, Lawrence L. Gillespie, Mrs. Horace Gallatin, Mrs. James B. Haggin, Ogden Hammond, T. Suffern Taller and Vincent Astor.

Mr. Astor and Mr. Taller were appointed a committee to establish the line.

As they saw it, the main considerations, in order named, were these: Safety, reliability in performance and speed. With these in view, they abandoned the idea of effecting economy through purchase from the Government of surplus seaplanes built during the war. They decided to install new equipment which should embody advances made in aviation since the war. Mr. Astor owned and had operated successfully a Loening air yacht, and, based upon his experiences and other study, the committee decided upon this monoplane type of flying boat, which holds the world's seaplane record for altitude with four passengers and which had been awarded the Aero Club of America trophy for the greatest achievement in aviation in 1922.

This type is equipped with a 400-horsepower Liberty motor, and the 2,600-pound air yacht is capable of carrying a total load, including fuel, of 1,500 pounds. The passenger-carrying space reminds one of a small touring car. Three people can be accommodated on the rear seat. The pilot occupies the left front seat, and beside him is a fourth passenger. Entrance is from the front, with swinging fore-doors, like a hansom cab.

Three air yachts, Fleetwing, Sea Bird and Grey Lark, were purchased from the Loening Aeronautical Engineering Company, and an independent company, the New York-Newport Air Service, Inc., was organized under the laws of Delaware with the following Directors: Vincent Astor, Edwin de T. Bechtel, Charles L. Lawrence, Roger M. Poor, John Carrington Yates, Grover C. Loening and A. P. Loening.

Practical Men in Control.

Actual management of the line is in the hands of the Loening brothers. Contrasted with the long motor rides to the Mendon and Bourget fields of the London-Paris route, the Newport seaplane passenger merely has to go to the foot of East Thirty-first Street, where the New York terminal is conveniently situated next to the Loening factory. While five expert Liberty motor mechanics lent by the United States Air Mail Service make final inspection of the air yacht, the passenger receives a ticket.

On board the air yacht the passengers—a business man with his brief case, the wife of a naval officer stationed at the Newport Naval War College and a young tennis player with a new racquet which he intends trying an hour and a half later—have room enough in which to be comfortable. One can read, and there is no prohibition against smoking. A windshield and a sliding top covering are protection against the wind and weather. A heavy thunder shower or a thick fog is virtually the only cause for delay.

MAGNUS JOHNSON TALKS OF HIS PLANS

GUN FOR "BIG INTERESTS"

Wants Radical Laws to Control Great Industries

LOUDEST-VOICED SENATOR

Early Days as Glass Blower in Sweden Developed His Lungs, He Says.

MAGNUS JOHNSON of Meeker County, Minnesota, the second member of the Farmer-Labor Party to be elected to a seat in the United States Senate—the other being his more youthful Minnesota colleague, Hendrick Shipstead—is certain to be one of the most picturesque figures in the Sixty-eighth Congress. He is a "dirt farmer" if ever there was a tiller of the soil worthy of that description, and if he does all the things he has promised to do in the way of bringing about radical legislation he will be the busiest individual ever sent to Washington by any American constituency.

The new Senator, who is pledged in advance to line up with the La Follette-Wheeler-Brookhart bloc, is a native of Sweden, and landed first on American soil thirty years ago. In Sweden he was a glass blower, and reports are that he was a top-notcher at that trade. His specialty was the blowing of bottles. But he did not follow his trade in this country. Instead he caught the Westward Ho fever and went to Minnesota, establishing himself on a farm in Meeker County, a farm he still owns, although, as he generally found occasion to point out during his campaign for the Senatorship, it has a "big mortgage" on it.

The new Senator, who was born in Warmland, Sweden, fifty-two years ago, is known from end to end of Minnesota as Magnus. Mighty few people ever refer to him as Mr. Johnson. To everybody he is just Magnus, the big, good-natured, smiling, even though radical, Swedish-American farmer from Meeker County. For years he has been a leader in the farmer co-operative movements, and of him it is said he personally knows more farmers than any other man in the whole Northwest country.

Minnesota's new Senator, so say his friends, never wore a dress suit in his life, and they further affirm he never will. He campaigned in his shirt sleeves, and when the days were very hot he had a habit of removing collar and tie. He is of medium height, wears gold-rimmed spectacles, likes to mix with the people, refers to himself as Magnus, and admits that he has the loudest voice of any man in Minnesota.

That voice of Magnus's is certain to create a sensation in the Senate. One jocular Republican politician remarked to the writer that when Johnson gives his first blast in the Senate Chamber, Henry Cabot Lodge, if present, will promptly faint. Hedlin, until now the champion loud and long distance talker of the Senate, will have to take a back seat in the new Senate, at least so far as lung power is concerned. It was his youthful trade as a glass blower, Senator Johnson says, which developed his powerful lungs. But it is not a rasping, unpleasant voice. Just the contrary. You can hear him a block or two when he speaks in the open, and he may shake the roof in the Senate Chamber. But the voice is pleasant and the new Senator's colleagues can rest assured that their eardrums are in no danger.

His Swedish Pronunciation.

The dialect which features the public utterances of Minnesota's farmer Senator has been the subject for a lot of good-natured fun in his home State. He pronounces his "j's" and his "g's" like "y," while his "y's" are "w's." For instance, Governor Preus, whom he defeated, he always refers to as "Yaks." Germany is "Yermany" and "voice" is "woice." It goes without saying that Magnus's dialect did not lose him any votes among the Scandinavian farmers of Minnesota.

The public career of Senator Johnson started eight years ago when he was elected to the Legislature. He served two terms and was one of the hardest working members, especially with regard to farmer and labor legislation. In 1922 he was Farmer-Labor candidate for Governor against Governor Preus. He came within less than 15,000 votes of election. When the Governor called a special session to fill the vacancy in the Senate due to the death of Senator Knute Nelson it was a foregone conclusion that Magnus would win the Farmer-Labor nomination.

Here is the platform on which Johnson went to the people of Minnesota and on which he was elected. It tells its own story:

Repeal of the Esch-Cummins Railroad law.

Restriction of the use of court injunctions in labor disputes.

Regulation of the packers, oil, coal, steel and all the other big business enterprises popularly classed as "trusts."

Nationalization of the nation's water power.

National farm marketing legislation.

Curtailment of the powers of the Supreme Court so as to make impossible five to four decisions in declaring acts of Congress unconstitutional. If he has his way the new Senator would make it impossible for the court to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional.

Revision downward of the Fordney-McCumber Tariff law.

Operation of the Federal Reserve system "in the interest of the people" and not, as he asserts is now the case, in the interest of big business and Wall Street.

For "Yes and No" Men.

"I have been in the Legislature for a good many years," said Mr. Johnson, "and my experience has taught me that the two most important words in English, so far at least as men who make laws are concerned, are the little words 'yes' and 'no.' The fellow who knows when to vote 'yes' and when to vote 'no' is mighty apt to turn out to be a pretty good sort of legislator. Think it over and I am sure you will agree with me.

"You want to know what I stand for, what my program is going to be when I take my seat in the Senate at Washington. I will try to tell you. Well, I am against the Federal Reserve system as now administered. I am not against the law. I think it is a pretty good law, and if operated properly it will function to the benefit of all the people. That's what I want it to do, and it's not doing that now. The history of recent inflation and deflation is a good illustration of the failure of the men we have been sending to Washington to protect the people. I am against a Federal Reserve Board which is influenced by the banking trust. I want men on the board who will have the interests of the masses at heart, and I am going to do my best to get such men on it, too.

"Under inflation every person and every newspaper the politicians could command urged the farmers to produce more, to borrow more money at the banks, to keep their mouths shut about how hard it was to make both ends meet and pay the wartime profiteering prices at the same time. Then, about the time the farmers were ready to begin paying up, these politicians decided that deflation would be the best thing for them, and all of us, at least in the Western and Southern agricultural sections, know what the result was. The profiteers got their profits and the farmers got—mortgages. This deflation meant that the farmers had to pay their mortgages and their loans while the proceeds of their products were being cut in two, and the country bankers and the country business men were in just about as bad a fix as their farmer neighbors.

"All this misfortune was not a natural calamity, like the eruption of a volcano or a plague of grasshoppers. It was by and for certain interests. The Federal Reserve Board decided to deflate by drastic calling in of loans. By this means it was made possible for the big financiers to get the property of their debtors at half price, and by debtors I mean farmers and business fellows who must borrow to carry on their business. If for no other reason, I think my election was justified as a protest against this vicious policy of the Federal Reserve Board. Instead of heading off a crisis, the board brought one on. It was rotten business, and I am going to work and vote to make impossible the repetition of what happened when this deflation policy was put forward.

"In the second place, you can depend on me to agitate for any measure that will bring farm prices back to a level somewhere near the point at which the debts these farmers are now trying to pay were contracted. Right here comes in this high tariff wall. If farmers could buy where most of their prices are made—that is, in the world market—they would be a lot better off than they are now. If we could wear the overalls, the shoes and the shirts made by the man in Liverpool or London who sets our wheat, it would not take so much wheat to clothe a family or so many bushels of potatoes to buy one little pound of tea. This is a problem that's got to be solved, and I am going to do my humble part in trying to find the answer.

For Soldiers' Bonus.

"Again, I am against the use of Government offices, and this includes the courts, to bolster up the big employers' side in labor disputes. And I am just as much against this thing called imperialism, and I don't think we need either a big navy or a big army. As for European conditions, I am not able to change my mind as quickly as some other fools can. Just five years ago it was disloyal for a man or woman not to believe that we should participate in the affairs of Europe to the extent of all our man power and our treasure, so that in the end the world might be made safe for democracy. Then two years passed and we were told that to continue to participate in the affairs of Europe would be a betrayal of the principles of Washington and Lincoln. The world is getting smaller all the time, with airships and other coming means of transportation. No Chinese Wall is going to stop a flying machine. And, being so close together, it is necessary that the people of the world know more about each other and understand one another better. The people of the different countries must themselves see to it that their Governments are progressive. An imperialistic Government is the same no matter where it is. An international world court organized by such Governments is certain to be just as imperialistic as its creators, and I am against the World Court. As to what our foreign policies should be, I shall be largely guided by my progressive colleagues in the Senate, several of whom (Johnson of California and Brookhart) have been in Europe this year.

"Don't forget the Esch-Cummins law. That law must be repealed. Some of these freight rates, so far as agriculture is concerned, are confiscatory. That is a big statement, but it's true. They yelp about Government ownership—that is, the reactionaries do—because they say the people will not elect a President and a Congress capable of running the railroads and at the same time shutting out graft. Perhaps they won't be able to do so so long as the people continue to vote for Republican or Democratic reactionaries. Public ownership is a more conservative proposition than yelling about rates, as some of our G. O. P. politicians are doing in their scramble for votes. Consolidation of the railroad lines won't cut out watered stock or stop financial milking of the railroads. It is a way to prolong the agony rather than a cure for the disease.

"You ask if I am for paying a bonus to the soldiers. Of course I am, but it must be the right kind of a bonus, and the profiteers and not the common folks must pay it. The disgraceful treatment accorded those boys who went to Europe and fought in the slime and mud while the profiteers stayed home and grew richer and richer is a wrong that's got to be righted. The reason no plan succeeded was because Wall Street was afraid that any bonus for the soldiers might interfere with the program for the repeal of the excess-profits tax, and after that they got scared again because it was feared it might interfere with the deflation policy. The bonus can be paid without taxing the masses. I don't think anybody should be permitted to inherit a million dollars in this country so long as this bonus remains unpaid."

FARMER AND HIGH TAXES TWO OF BIG ISSUES IN 1924

DRY LAW A RUNNER-UP

Edge Sees Change Vital, Other Leaders Avoid the Question

HARDING RECORD A TARGET

Opponents Believe It Is Vulnerable Point, But Republicans Insist It Is an Asset.

The question of issues in the 1924 campaign is commanding more attention every day. In an effort to learn the sentiment of leaders on both sides THE NEW YORK TIMES submitted the issue to men prominent in Washington, whose views follow. The Democrats hold up the high tariff, too much centralization of power and "mistakes" of the Harding Administration as the outstanding issues. Republicans defend the Administration as economical and efficient. Both sides keep away from the wet and dry issue, and opinion on the World Court is not strongly defined.

SOME OF THE ISSUES IN DEMOCRATIC CAMP

By CORDELL HULL,
Chairman Democratic National Committee.

ALL the live and material issues of 1924 cannot now be forecast, either in general or in detail, both on account of changing conditions and of the ability of the party in power to make and unmake some issues by acts of omission and commission. All pressing and vital issues materially affecting the welfare of the people, or of most of them, should be kept abreast of each other. The next Democratic National Convention alone can define the issue for Democrats. From present-day opinion and discussion the following may be pointed to as some of the more important issues of the present and the immediate future, without reference to the order of their importance:

The demonstrated failure of the Harding Administration, which has been aimless, instable, and unable either to understand or solve most of the acute domestic and international problems.

The broken Republican platform pledge to reduce the high cost of living and prosecute the profiteers.

The Fordney-McCumber tariff law, already costing the people four billion dollars a year in excessive and extortionate prices.

Special privilege in its many other aggravated forms, as prompted and championed by the Harding Administration.

The practical application of the principle of international co-operation—embracing the essentials and fundamentals of the foreign policies of the recent Democratic Administration—to existing conditions, contrasted with the humiliating failure of the Harding Administration to deal decisively with any important phase of foreign affairs.

A constructive patriotic merchant marine policy as against the proposed Harding-Lasker ship subsidy.

A sound and humane industrial policy to solve industrial problems—to insure full and equal justice to labor and capital, and to sustain their peaceful relations—in contrast with hopeless Republican failure during the last two years.

Relief in transportation and transportation costs.

A more progressive and constructive remedy for the desperate condition of agriculture, especially as it relates to transportation and distribution and foreign markets.

Speedy and equitable tax reduction—Federal, State and local—accompanied by rigid economy.

States' rights and local self-government in matters purely local in their nature.

Honesty and efficiency in the public service, contrasted with corruption and almost anarchy in a number of Government departments.

Republican betrayal of the Civil Service.

A much higher standard of public and political morals in contrast with Newberryism and Daughertyism.

Application of the great body of intelligent, sound, liberal and progressive sentiment to the prompt solution of conditions and problems affecting the commercial, economic, industrial and social welfare of the people.

The adoption of sound economic and trade policies, domestic and foreign, in contrast with existing wholly unsound policies, or none at all, of the Harding Administration.

SAYS HARDING FALTERS, NATION SEEKS LEADER

By SENATOR A. O. STANLEY,
Democrat, from Kentucky.

THE present Administration owes its existence not to any special confidence in or enthusiasm for the platform or its candidates. Its majority was the evidence of a multitudinous grouch, upon which expert politicians, playing with consummate skill, succeeded in arraying every element of discontent and disloyalty against the Wilson Administration and the Democratic ticket.

The Administration is in power not because anybody was especially enthusiastic about it, but because of the number who were against something or somebody else.

The President now realizes that it is one thing to utilize unreasoning discontent and blatant disloyalty and quite another thing to satisfy it.

In the midst of world unrest and uncertainty the need of the hour is leadership. Conditions at home and abroad imperatively demand an executive serene, self-poised, clear-visioned, with an iron will and an indomitable purpose.

In the last Republican convention the masses of the party turned instinctively to two outstanding figures who in a measure possessed those qualities, but Lowden became involved at the last hour in an election scandal in Missouri and General Wood slipped up on a cake of soap and the choice for President was left not to the masses in the party but to a close Senatorial oligarchy.

A leader in the White House was the last thing they wanted, hoping, as they did, to control the legislative branch in person and the Executive by proxy. This program contemplated not a political master, but an obedient disciple, and they chose Mr. Harding.

The President's troubles have arisen not so much from an unwillingness to follow as from an inability to determine just which political group he should regard "with deference and devotion."

Political Crazy-Quilt.

One day the Senatorial oligarchy has the Presidential ear and the next the Hughes-Root-Hoover contingent is in the ascendency, the policies of the President constituting one continual vacillation between the conflicting schools and rival leaders in his own organization. The result of this condition of affairs is a political crazy-quilt, a mass of conflicting and incongruous purposes and policies initiated by the same Executive. As a candidate he is for the bonus, as President he is against it. A tariff bill is enacted equally inconsistent with every sane theory of protection and of free trade.

A lack of central control has resulted in a saturnalia of incompetence and extravagance, as evidenced by the recent junket on the Leviathan. One day the President is a first-class irreconcilable, boldly denunciatory of the League of Nations and every other form of entangling alliance, and the next day he is the advocate of a Four-Power Treaty with all the vices and none of the virtues of the League of Nations, and now he rivals Wilson in his almost tearful cry that we will "break the heart of the world" if we do not take an active part in international affairs and a strong hand in international controversies. The position of Wilson in his advocacy of the League is consistent, the position of Borah and Johnson is equally consistent, though in my opinion erroneous; the bifurcated policy of the President appeals to neither.

The end is in sight. A weak and wabbling policy, with the President perambulating between extremes, attempting to meet the demands of all and satisfying none, he is doomed to failure and certain defeat. That is, unless the Democrats, as Grant used to say, "act the d—— fool at the proper time."

CHANGES IN DRY LAW ESSENTIAL, SAYS EDGE

By SENATOR WALTER E. EDGE,
Republican, from New Jersey.

IN considering the issues of the 1924 campaign, the problems facing the next Congress must first be reviewed. Congress may or may not dispose of some of them before platforms are formulated.

I am opposed to continued Government administration of a merchant marine. Congress and apparently the country have spoken against a subsidy. I cannot conceive of any condition arising that would alter my judgment that ships and accessories not now needed for the public defense should be disposed of on the best possible terms and at once.

The prosperity of the country and with it the finances of the Government have steadily improved during the last year, and, if we do not depart from traditional policies and thus discourage initiative, should so continue. We should, therefore, be able to agree on a soldiers' co-operative plan which would not overburden the taxpayers, of whom the veterans themselves form a not inconsiderable part, and still do justice to the nation's defenders. It is an issue that must be faced. It cannot be sidetracked. To leave this open until the 1924 elections will invite bids for soldier support, tending to encourage illogical pledges. Personally, I believe in some type of a sales tax, so that all who were served will in proper proportion pay this just obligation.

Railroad legislation cannot be evaded. The issue in this regard, in my judgment, will be an effort on the part of conservative members of both parties to prevent Government administration, which is even more of a menace than running the ships. The latter was a war legacy, but running the railroads was a war deficit, and should be a lesson for all time to come.

The World Court should not be an issue between parties or factions of parties. It is simply a broadening out of the universally accepted policy of adjustment of disputes by law, and in the final analysis I am confident the American people cannot be camouflaged that membership in any way even savors of foreign political entanglements.

Coal Another Issue.

The inability to obtain coal as needed at what is considered reasonable prices never has been satisfactorily explained to a suffering public. When the "Fact Finding Coal Commission" created by the last Congress and now at work reports, I hope the information presented will enable Congress to pass legislation to correct existing evils. It is inconceivable that a plain, frank presentation of facts would not make it possible to remove this irritation as a political football. I will not attempt to suggest the remedy until the real facts are presented, but there should be no hesitation to act without fear or favor. No problem, unless it be the Volstead act, demands a prompter solution.

Speaking of the wet and dry issue: it is useless to try to keep it "out of politics." The mere fact that it directly affects so many and that conflicting views are so acute necessarily keeps it to the front as a burning political issue. I am convinced that much of the existing spirit of protest is caused by a realization that many of the impossible provisions of the Volstead act are not warranted by the clear terms of the Eighteenth Amendment. The amendment alone prohibits the use of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. The public challenges the indefensible one-half of 1 per cent. alcoholic maximum, when every other country defining intoxicating beverages are allowing at least 2¼ per cent.; the Volstead act's control of physicians' prescriptions; the effort to police the liberty of foreign citizens under their own flag, &c. Neither the extreme wets nor the extreme drys will ever solve the problem, but if the Eighteenth Amendment is frankly written into the Volstead act it will go a long way toward increasing respect for the law. These changes may not be made by the next Congress, already elected, but they surely will come when members vote as they privately talk, publicly act and honestly feel.

There are other issues and other problems—agricultural co-operation with several recent acts yet to be tried out; taxation—but with a going country we will do well to hold it where it is; immigration—which, while it should always be restricted, should not be so arbitrary as to create the confusing and almost inhuman happenings recently recorded. More investigation on the other side is imperative and would greatly relieve the situation, and Congress can be depended on to discover or create many more issues.

If Congress sidesteps or steers clear of evolution and fundamentalism there is still a chance for a constructive program.

TAMPERING WITH LIBERTY ISSUE THAT AFFECTS ALL

By SENATOR T. H. CARAWAY,
Democrat, from Arkansas.

THE issues, in my opinion, will be many. First, the issue of a world market for our products. That means a composed Europe, and since two angry men cannot settle a quarrel, there must be an arbiter. This does not necessarily mean lending Europe money or entering into any European engagements.

Second is the issue of the expense of government. The cost of governmental operation must come down so that the producers will cease to be share-croppers with the tax gatherers, who will then leave a little more with the producer than he takes away from him.

Third, interference with individual liberty must cease. It has got so that every activity men engage in, however creditable, is hampered by governmental interference. This constant governmental nagging should be ended.

Fourth, the tariff wall. If we refuse to let people sell to us, they cannot buy from us. The tariff will most certainly be an issue.

Fifth is transportation. We must have cheaper rates, not only by land, but also on the water.

"INTERESTS" AT STAKE, IS VIEW OF GOMPERS

By SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

IT is impossible to know what issues the politicians may seek to develop for the 1924 campaign; but so far as the people are concerned there are many issues already developed of paramount importance.

More important than any single specific issue is the general question of whether the policy of Government is to be a big-business policy or a people's policy.

The tendency at present is in favor of big business, and I am of the opinion that many politicians sadly underestimate the resentment against this which is felt by the masses of our people. Recent decisions of the Supreme Court, for example, have shown this tendency in the minimum wage for women case, in the child labor case, in the Coronado case and in other cases.

I do not see how the issue thus created can be avoided by politicians. Neither do I see how there can be an escape from the consequences of such things as the shameful Teapot Dome oil scandal and the iniquitous Ship Subsidy bill. I am convinced also that our attitude toward the rest of the world will strike a vital issue in the next campaign. I am convinced that on that issue there will be a sounder, more constructive judgment than was rendered in the campaign of 1920.

Many matters thus will enter into the next campaign as issues, but all of these things will be summed up in the one great question of whether Government is to serve the people or what has become popularly known as "the interests."

HIGH COST OF LIVING SEEN AS BIG QUESTION

By SENATOR ARTHUR CAPPER,
Leader of Senate Farm Bloc.

IT is difficult to predict with certainty the issues for the 1924 campaign, but I believe the outstanding issues will revolve around our domestic problems—the high cost of living, curbing profiteering sugar, coal and other commodities. The people will want to know why the cost of such commodities should go up, when there has been no appreciable increase in wages recently and the price received by the farmer, the producer, in a great many cases does not even meet the cost of production. It is also difficult for the masses to understand why, with the railroads hauling the greatest tonnage in their history and declaring big dividends regularly, there cannot be some relief from high freight rates.

It is things of this sort—things that affect the individual in his every-day life—that are going to be dominant in the next campaign. The folk who foot the bills will want information as to whether everything is being done that can be done to bring living costs down.

While attention will be given to the foreign situation as it affects our country and an attempt may be made to make the League of Nations an issue, I do not believe that the League question will enter seriously into the campaign. President Harding's plea for the participation of this country in the International Court of Justice will, in my judgment, be one of the leading questions, though not necessarily outstanding, compared to our domestic problems. I believe the people of the nation are in a receptive mood on the International Court question. They are sick of war and will, I am confident, regard the settlement of international questions by a tribunal of this kind as a long step toward the outlawing of armed conflict between nations.

In the East, modifications in the Volstead act may find a prominent place in the campaign, especially in the larger cities, but steps looking to modifications in the prohibitory law will meet with the strongest kind of opposition in the West and Middle West.

BRYAN SEES FARMER OUTSTANDING PROBLEM

By WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN.

IT is the business of newspaper men to ask questions and it is a pleasure to answer them when an answer is possible. It is easier, however, to be far-sighted in asking questions than in answering them. One can ask without limit, but in answering one is restricted to what he knows, or thinks he knows. The future itself refuses to answer questions, and those who do venture to answer must be very cautious if they have any regard for their reputation, because no one knows what a day may bring forth in politics.

The issue—or I think it is better to say issues—of 1924 will be determined largely by what the next session of Congress does and by what is done in Europe between now and the conventions. We have the domestic questions with us always; in each campaign we have a paramount issue—the issue that is made paramount by events. Domestic issues absorb attention except when the American people are compelled to lift their eyes above the domestic horizon and survey the world at large. At home

FAMOUS ARTICLE X. LEADS VERY MODEST LIFE AT GENEVA

LITTLE LEFT OF BOGY

We Have Forgotten Its Existence, Says Official

'NEVER WILL BE NECESSARY'

Article XVI., Providing for Financial and Economic Boycott, Preferred in Its Stead.

With the Council of the League of Nations in session at Geneva, the following article has especial timeliness and interest.

By AN AMERICAN OBSERVER.

I HAD been in Geneva for months and had spent much of my time among those men who make up the working force which operates the League of Nations. I had been a bit hazy as to how that agency would appear when viewed first hand, when seen chugging along under its own steam. I had seen it holding world conferences on the suppression of opium, of the traffic in women and children, on sanitary co-operation, on the financial rehabilitation of Austria, on the facilitation of international communication. But in all those months I had never caught a glimpse of Article X., running rampant, seeking whom it might devour.

Finally I asked an official of the league point blank where this article could be seen actually in the performance of those gyrations which had so terrorized certain large areas on the map of the world.

"Article X.," he said ruminatingly. "It seems that I must have heard of it somewhere. Certainly it was not anywhere around headquarters here. The League has been in operation for four years now. Certainly nothing has taken place during that four years that has brought up the subject of Article X. Ah, yes. I remember. I have read of Article X. in the American newspapers. How does it read? 'Members of the League undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League.' It was a sort of pledge to stop aggression. It is there in the covenant, but in Europe it has received hardly a mention. No act of the League has had anything to do with it. If it had been left out of the covenant entirely League would have functioned just as it does. We have forgotten the existence of Article X."

"But," I insisted, "I have been led to believe that Article X. is the very heart of the covenant."

"That article," he explained, "was written at a time when the world had just witnessed the most titanic demonstration of force of all the ages. It thought in terms of force. It put force back of the League. The League was like an expedition setting out into the unknown. It might take along an extra team for every wagon. But, perhaps, when the expedition got under way, it would find only level plains and macadam highways. It might find that some other agency was available, the pull of a motor, for instance, which was more effective than the extra team. The horses would be turned out to grass. Thus has it been with Article X."

"But the covenant of the League of Nations," I insisted, "is a written constitution just like that upon which our Government is founded. Article X. is a part of the fundamental document. It cannot be thrown away."

"Never Will Be Necessary."

"It is a part of the fundamental document just as the buttons on the back of a long-tailed coat is a part of it. They are there, may always be there. But they are of no use. They had a use when they were first put there. Gentlemen used to turn up their long coat-tails and button them out of the way when they mounted their horses. When Article X. was put in the League covenant it was thought to have a use. It has been shown that it will never be necessary to button any international situation on to it."

In the first place, it was explained, the fifty-two nations that had signed the covenant had pledged themselves that they would not go to war, that they would refer any question that threatened war, to the Council of the League. Nobody knew how much this pledge would mean, whether they would do it or not. It was necessary to wait for events to demonstrate the workability of the plan. Presently Sweden and Finland came to a clash over the ownership of the Aaland Islands, there in the Baltic. There was a threat of resort to the old method, war. Some one suggested that these nations were members of the League of Nations and that they had agreed to refer such differences to it. They did so. The issue was settled peacefully. Poland and Lithuania referred a similar dispute to the League. Upper Celicia, the most desperate of them all, was so referred and settled. Nations were living up to their agreements to refer.

Then, along came a nation which refused to refer. Jugoslavia declined to respect the "territorial integrity" of Albania, a sister nation in the League. Article X. bound the nations to "preserve" Albania against aggression. The Jugoslav army was actually over the boundary in Albania.

Still, nobody at the League ever thought of Article X. The situation, desperate as it was, did not require it. The League has other expedients. In the first place, it can summon the recalcitrant nations before its Council, question them and turn the spotlight of the world upon the fact that they are disregarding their signed and sealed obligations. Such a nation would be likely to lose a bit of standing among its fellows. Nations are sensitive. National pride is intense. This might not be a sufficient restraining influence. As a matter of fact, Jugoslavia was driving on without waiting to give the Council a chance to make an inquiry.

So the League had to use another weapon that it has up its sleeve—the financial and economic boycott. Article XVI. provides that when a nation fails to keep its pledges, the financial and economic boycott may be applied, that the fifty-two will sever all business communication with the offender.

As a matter of fact, this pressure was never applied to Jugoslavia. Mr. Lloyd George wrote a letter to the Council of the League suggesting its application. That mere suggestion caused a tremendous financial panic in Jugoslavia. So great was this panic that the army in Albania was immediately recalled. The League itself was greatly surprised at the power of this instrument which it held but which it had never used.

Control of Opium Traffic.

There has recently presented itself another occasion upon which the nations have found it necessary to indicate their intention of applying the boycott. The League, with the co-operation of the United States, has been making an attempt to control the traffic in opium. One of its first steps to that end has been an agreement which is to the effect that the nations party to that agreement will buy or sell opium only upon presentation of a governmental export license. If a British merchant, for instance, wanted to buy a ton of raw material, he would have to get a license from his own Government to do so, and would have to arrange to give an accounting of his disposition of that opium. There are three principal opium-producing countries—India, Turkey and Persia. Turkey and Persia failed to become parties to this export license agreement. They did not want the opium traffic interfered with. The other nations thereupon took the position that they would buy opium only from those nations that were party to the export license agreement. Turkey and Persia were faced with the loss of the opium trade or the greater part of the world. They immediately indicated a change of heart.

The nations in the League have come to the conclusion, based upon experience, that few of the sisterhood will have the temerity to run counter to the public opinion of the world, expressed through this common, authoritative body. They have come to the further conclusion that where they do the most drastic resort to which they will ever need apply is the financial and economic boycott. No nation can stand against it. A little isolated country like Jugoslavia or Persia can come nearer it than a great nation like France or England, because the great nations depend more largely upon outside operations for their existence. The average nation like Switzerland, Austria or Italy raises not more than half its foodstuffs, often is entirely without coal and must import the raw materials for its industries. It couldn't exist without contact with its fellows.

It is a peculiarity of the situation at Geneva that less attention is paid to the written form of the covenant than one would expect. Americans are accustomed to operating under a written constitution, a very set, hard and fast document. Most of the other countries of the world are accustomed to operate without any such so-called fundamental document. Great Britain, for instance, has no written constitution and no document that even compares with it. Because of this fact she has not taken the view that the covenant of the League was a hard and fast document that must be followed to the letter. We are accustomed to encountering great difficulty in amending a constitution. Other nations are used to greater freedom of action. We were afraid to subscribe to the League covenant, because we considered it an ironclad and almost unchangeable document. They had no hesitancy because they expected to make whatever adjustments were necessary, and considered such adjustments easy. The Covenant brings them together for common action, they hold. If it does not suit their purpose, once they are assembled, they will change it.

Take, for instance, the matter of the number of members in the Council of the League. It is not an important question, but it indicates the view of the nations as to their freedom of action. The Covenant said there should be eight members of the Council. Four of these should be representatives of the four great nations. Four should be selected from among the lesser nations. After three years of experiment the League Assembly decided, and the Council agreed, that it would be better if the smaller nations had more representation. They should be given six members on the Council.

Fifty-two Nations Represented.

The covenant, to be sure, could be amended by the action of the Assembly and the Council, followed by a ratification by the majority of the nations. That process, particularly the ratification, would take a long time. So the Assembly appointed two more members to the Council from among the lesser nations, and, nobody objecting, they are today sitting with that body.

When the League was young many amendments to the Covenant were proposed. A score of them were adopted by the Council and the Assembly and submitted to the nations for ratification. But ratification is a slow process. None of these amendments have secured the number of ratifications which were prescribed to make them a part of the original document. Little attention is being paid to these ratifications. Nobody is worrying about them. The position that is generally accepted is that the important thing is that the nations should co-operate in the League for the accomplishment of their common tasks. Little patience is shown with technicalities that may stand in the way.

Fifty-two nations are represented at Geneva. Through their representatives these nations agree that certain action is necessary to accomplish a certain end. They believe, for instance, that common action should be taken to rehabilitate Austria. Nobody ever raised the question of the right of the League under its charter to take this action. A constitutional lawyer could have shown twenty reasons why this thing could not be done. The American mind would have been inclined to consider those constitutional reasons. The Assembly would have given no consideration whatever to Senator Bailey of Texas, for instance, had he risen and propounded the unconstitutionality of such action.

Any action of the League must be assented to unanimously by the Council. Each of the great powers has a man on the Council, so no action will ever be taken of which the great nations do not all approve. But when all approve they work on the theory of proceeding in business. Then the nations are not bound until their home Governments ratify. Thus is any nation adequately protected from being bound by what might appear to be hasty action. No nation can be bound to do anything that it does not want to. Ratification is an act of its home Government. But where there is agreement the League drives ahead to accomplishment unfettered by technicalities.

In operation, say the people at the League, there is yet another insurance against the application of Article X. If there should be a member of the League which was threatening the political or geographical integrity of another member and should both members fail to report their difference to the League, fail to refer it there for settlement, any other member may hail the two before the Council and insist that it look into the matter. If there is a situation anywhere which threatens war between members of the League, any nation can have it investigated, have the offending nations called up and questioned. Thus is there another check which stands in the way of an issue ever developing to that point where an application of Article X. would be required.

So sure is everybody concerned that there will never be an occasion for applying Article X. that there is general discussion of its elimination. It is a dead letter. Let it lie in peace or eliminate it. It does not matter. It has never been used, and will never be used. It is the appendix of the League. It might get a grape seed in it. When these nations get together each Autumn they act on the principle that they can do whatever they want to, provided there is general agreement. If they decide to operate, they will do it. They like action.

The Canadian delegation at the last Assembly meeting stepped boldly forth and proposed that Article X. be scrapped. The Assembly took no final action on this proposal. When the Council met in January last, however, it decided to send a circular letter to the nations composing the League asking their opinions on this proposal.

Answers to these letters were in by the time of the July meeting. They were to the effect that it was yet too early to take the action proposed by Canada. The League was not old enough. Maybe an occasion would arise, an occasion which could not be foreseen, in which it would be of use. Better hang on to Article X. a little longer. Such seemed to be the result of this informal poll that the League took of its members. It finds this method of getting at the opinion of the member nations very effective.

The League has a disarmament commission which has been working diligently for four years toward an agreement among nations which would solve the riddle of the ages—which would end war—believes that it is approaching the formula that will be acceptable to them all. It will contain the idea of guarantee against attack, of mutual guarantees. It will contain whatever there is in Article X. that, in the light of experience, seems worthy to survive. It will provide, however, that a non-European nation need not rush to the defense of a European nation, and that European nations need not interfere in American affairs. It is the immediate neighbors of a nation in trouble that will be expected to come to her rescue. If two nations plunge into war, the Council of the League will decide as to which is the aggressor, and other nations neighbor to the attacked member will come to her rescue.

This provision for mutual guarantee is never expected to be used, but it will stand on record in case any individual does run amuck. With it standing there nations can proceed to a reduction of armament, which is the point of the whole matter. When this agreement is actually reached the last vestige of use for Article X. will have disappeared.

DULLEST JOB IN THE WORLD.

IT is doubtful if there is any duller job on earth than that held by a red-faced, pathetic-looking individual who sits day after day in a small boat tied by a rope to Blackfriars Bridge, which crosses the Thames in the busiest part of London. Painters are at work on the bridge, and this man's job is to cast off his rope and catch them if and when they fall into the river.

Fourteen years ago a painter at work on the Tower Bridge did fall off the scaffolding and plunge into the river, to arise no more; and in consequence a demand arose that professional watchers be installed in the river below as rescuers, whenever bridge-painting operations should be started anywhere within the metropolitan limits.

The local authorities yielded to the demand, and although for fourteen years no one else has ever splashed into the Thames from a municipal undertaking, the job goes on. The present occupant sits huddled in the stern seat wrapped in an enormous overcoat, looking completely miserable. He probably is wondering if there will be another period of fourteen years to go without excitement. When it rains, as it does with unusual frequency in London, his boredom is emphasized, because he has naught to entertain him but the desolate rocking of the boat by the waves thrown up from passing barges.

NEW STONE MARKS GRAVE OF POE'S LAMENTED HELEN

OVER the grave of Mrs. Jane Stanard, honored as "Helen," by Edgar Allan Poe, there rests now, in a setting of marble, a bronze tablet — the gift of Dr. John W. Robertson of California. The grave of Mrs. Stanard is in historic Shockoe Cemetery, near Richmond, where lie buried many personages closely associated with the life and history of the city.

The tablet is fitted to a marble base, and has been placed directly in front of the monument to Mrs. Stanard, among California violets sent by Dr. Robertson, and planted there by J. H. Whitty of Richmond, President of the Poe Shrine. On the tablet is inscribed a verse from Poe's poem first known as "The Valley of Mists," but later called "The Valley of Unrest:"

> Helen, thy human eye,
> There the uneasy violets lie—
> There the reedy grass doth wave
> Over the old forgotten grave—
> One by one from the tree top
> There the eternal dews do drop.

Often during his youth Poe visited the grave in Shockoe where lies "Helen," mother of Poe's school friend Robert Stanard, and known as the first woman commemorated by Poe in his verses. Quoted by lovers, and admired the world over, the verses which Poe wrote to Mrs. Stanard are well known. The first stanza is deemed the most striking:

> Helen, thy beauty is to me
> Like those Nicean barks of yore,
> That homeward o'er the perfumed sea
> The weary, way-worn wanderer bore
> To his own native shore.

An interesting incident was related by Poe in connection with this verse. As a boy, going with Robert Stanard to the Stanard home, Mrs. Stanard greeted Poe with a warmth and friendliness which so affected the lonely lad that he went away bearing the vision of the idealized Helen as she came through her garden to him, and wrote, though still a schoolboy, his poem to her. After her death he often visited her grave in Shockoe.

Dr. Robertson, in making a study of conditions surrounding the life of Poe last Summer, incident to the publication of his book, "Psychopathic Study of Poe," visited the grave of "Helen," and was surprised to find it marked by no other than the family monument. The stone which he sent, with the bronze tablet of verse, was unveiled privately in the last week of June.

Other graves in Shockoe, near that of Helen, and closely associated with Poe and his writings, include those of Mrs. Elmyra Roster Shelton, to whom Poe wrote "To One in Paradise"; Mrs. Francis Keiling Allan, Poe's foster mother, who inspired "The Sleeper"; Miss Ann Valentine, to whom "Fannie" is accredited, and to whom Poe referred as "Aunt Nancy," the sister of Mrs. Allan.

Somewhat apart from these graves lies that of Eliza White, to whom Poe's "To Eliza" was inscribed. Miss White is the daughter of the editor with whom Poe was associated on the Southern Literary Messenger.

A movement has been set on foot to obtain an appropriation from the city for the upkeep of Shockoe Cemetery, where lie buried these and many other figures famed in the history and the poetry of the nation.

ACROSS THE SAHARA BY RAIL NEXT STEP

FRENCH HAVE THREE PLANS

TO DIG WELLS IN DESERT

Must Provide Livable Communities for Men Who Run Road and Their Families.

THE French Parliament soon will take up the project for a railway across the Sahara as the first step in an elaborate program to unify and develop France's possessions in Africa, so that within a generation the nation may make of itself one closely knit organism, reaching from the equator to the border of Belgium, endowed with a strength in peace and war unattainable by France as now constituted.

The trans-Sahara railway involves a feat in engineering as romantic as the conquest of Western America by the Union Pacific or the digging of the Panama Canal. It means flinging across this desolate expanse of the earth's surface a road 1,750 miles long, provided with water by deep artesian wells or carried in conduits over the most barren parts of the route.

When this is accomplished, as the French are certain it will be, France will gain direct and easy access to a realm in West Central Africa with riches hardly touched now and which she believes was destined by nature to become a second Garden of Eden. The projectors of this railway hope that eventually it will be pushed on southward to link with the British roads and become part of one great artery of travel and commerce running through an allied "Mittel-Africa" from the Mediterranean to the Cape of Good Hope.

This latter part of the plan is only a dream of the future, but the long-cherished vision of the crossing of the Sahara by locomotives already has materialized to the point that every phase of the engineering problems has been considered, its costs and probable revenues charted, and the method of financing it is being discussed by private interests and Government officials.

In harmony with the proposal for railway construction, but independent of it, is a plan on which work is under way for the irrigation of the Niger Valley in French West Africa and an intensive agricultural and industrial development of the Sudan on the southern edge of the Sahara desert. Experts of the French Ministry of Colonies who have made elaborate studies of the soil, the climate and the people assert that this dry but fertile area of three-quarters of a million square miles possesses possibilities of fruitfulness as great as those of the Nile and Euphrates valleys, which supported glorious civilizations for centuries. It requires only wisely conceived activity to make this an incalculably valuable reservoir of both the material products and the man power of which France is in need.

The French plans for a trans-Sahara railroad and the irrigation and development of the Niger Valley are the most striking phases of the complex scheme for colonial development which is being put into operation by Albert Sarraut, Minister of Colonies, now serving in the third consecutive Government of which he has been a member. The central principle of the Sarraut plan is that France and each part of the colonial empire will supplement each other in an economic and, so far as may be, in a political and cultural whole.

New Granary for France.

Some of the colonies have resources, undeveloped or little used, which are particularly needed by France. Thus Algeria, in the strip between the Mediterranean and the Atlas Mountains, has proved good ground for the cultivation of wheat and other grains of great importance to France. Further south coal and oil beds have been discovered, with deposits of many metals. On the edge of the Sahara itself flocks of sheep abound and indicate the possibility of a large mutton-packing industry in Africa. In Morocco experiments have been made with wool-bearing sheep of the variety which have enriched Australia, and the French hope some day to produce their wool there. Most important of all, the Sudan offers France a virgin field for the growing of cotton, one prime necessity which is very costly in France now.

Such a colonial organization would be unique and would possess tremendous power in the fact that no other nation's colonies are so closely grouped and so near geographically to the mother country. Most of France's empire is separated from her only by the Mediterranean, and this gap would be made secure in time of war by the concentration of the French Navy. With the proposed railway built, the Sudan, now twenty-one days distant from Paris by water and rail, would be but six days away, possibly less.

The most evident stumbling block to this ambitious but apparently feasible project lies in the financing of it. Elaborate plans are being worked out for this, just as they are for the engineering phases of the problem, with the object of dividing the burden among those who would benefit from the development, and spread it over a number of years.

The cost of the first division of the irrigation system planned for the Niger Valley is estimated at 262,000,000 francs, which it is believed could be paid off from earnings of the system within thirty years.

The cost of the railroad across the Sahara has been placed at 1,200,000,000 francs, something under a hundred million dollars, which would be borne by the companies undertaking its construction and by the State. Financial plans under consideration would impose a cost of no more than 60,000,000 francs a year on the French Government—insignificant for public expenses so.

The purpose of the "Chemin de Fer Transsaharien"—or, as it has already been tentatively named by one engineer, the "Sahara Central"—is military as well as economic, and it is probable that in the French consciousness the first-named consideration will weigh heavily in favor of undertaking the project. France, with her birth rate still declining and with her industrial fabric weak in comparison to that of such a rival as Germany, sees the chance for a powerful augmentation of her military potentialities in the linking of her African domains to France. Sparsely populated as they were and still are, Senegal and the Sudan furnished France real aid in the World War, and the black troops in general proved themselves adaptable and valuable. With French equatorial and Occidental Africa brought into close and direct and almost certainly safe communication with France, and with their population increased as the result of economic development, they could be counted on in an emergency for increased military aid, for soldiers and laborers and even for supplies.

Safest Route the Object.

The military phase of the question will almost surely determine the route to be taken across the Sahara. The dream of building such a road has actuated French engineers for years, and several routes have been laid out. One of the most promising, from a standpoint of peacetime value and prosperity, is that designed to run southwest through Morocco, skirting the desert and proceeding on through Mauretania to the port of Dakar on the extreme western tip of Africa. This probably will be abandoned because it would run too close to the sea, an element of danger in wartime, and also because it would lie near a foreign possession, Rio del Oro.

Another route has been laid out to reach French West Africa from the east, continuing the railroad already in operation from the Mediterranean port of Philippeville, through Biskra to Touggourt, then stretching across the Sahara and describing a great arc to Lake Tchad. This plan, too, has military disadvantages, because it lies closer to conceivably hostile territory and uses a port close to Italy.

The route likely to be chosen is that running south from Oran almost in a direct line to Tossaye, on the Niger, not far from Timbuctoo, and on south to Ouagadou, in the Haute Volta colony. This nowhere approaches territory not controlled by France and is over ground for the most part flat, with a gentle slope to the south, the value of which in providing by gravity the necessary water supply for the road is evident. The two principal plans following this general route have been drawn by Camille Sabatier, a lifelong student of Africa and the Sahara, and by the engineer, Godefroy. The Sabatier project is appreciably the shorter and its author professes to have left no engineering difficulties unsolved. Indeed, proponents of the trans-Sahara line assert that its construction and operation will be less difficult and expensive than ventures of similar magnitude in Europe and America. In the Sabatier project only seventy kilometers are likely to prove troublesome and only twenty are genuinely hard. A little more than 400 miles of the total of 1,750 are without water supply.

At Oran, on the Mediterranean, the Sabatier-Godefroy railroad would connect with the line running all along the northern coast of the French African possessions from Casablanca on the Atlantic, through Algiers to Tunis, and thus be doubly serviceable to the Sarraut plan of uniting the French colonial empire.

Moreover, 112 miles of this route, the most difficult of all, have been constructed, for the Sahara line can use as its northern section the standard-gauge road long in operation across the Atlas range from Oran to Ras-el-Ma. A narrow-gauge line runs 500 miles south over the projected route to Kenadsa and Colomb-Bechar, where the French have a military post.

At Kenadsa the route enters the desert and the question of water supply becomes all-important. Midway to Tossaye it crosses the country known as Tanezrouft, a name given it by the Arabs to signify its absolute aridity. It is the most dreaded part of the desert, but M. Sabatier believes that even there the water problem offers no insuperable difficulties.

Oil Engines the Best.

Closely related to the question of the water supply is that of the motive power to be used. Sabatier contends that the reservoirs in the Atlas watershed to the north, the artesian wells in the desert itself and the conduits running above the surface in the more desolate parts could furnish ample water even for steam locomotives, besides the considerable quantities necessary for travelers, train crews and the army of employes which will be built up and maintained in this reclaimed strip of land through the heart of the desert; enough even to provide the latter with irrigation for their gardens beside the railway.

It is the opinion, however, of those in touch with the Superior Council of National Defense, which is studying the trans-Sahara project and has just issued a report urging the carrying of it into execution, that the trains will be drawn by electric tractors or oil engines. Considerable electric current could be produced by the water courses of Algeria at the northern end of the route, and by damming the Niger, which at several places has a decided fall. But this would be costly, and those interested in colonial development believe in conserving such power for the native industries, actual or planned. Oil engines more than likely will be the solution. They have in their favor the fact that Northern Africa contains some oil deposits and engineers have lively hopes that large oil reserves may be found under the forbidding surface of the Sahara.

There are other problems to be considered. Among them is that presented by the nomads who still roam the desert and occasionally raid a caravan. The activities of these bands has had almost as much to do with making the Sahara practically an uninhabited waste as has the climate in the centuries since lower Africa boasted a civilization and the Sudan was a part of the Kingdom of Nubia. Raids are of rare occurrence now and the French have established thorough military control of the desert. There are torrential rains, which at long intervals of a dozen or a score of years, break in on the normal drought with downpours that tear great ravines through the sand. A greater enemy to combat is the much more frequent sandstorm. Observations continuing over many years have proved that the winds of the Sahara almost invariably are from east to west, and the builders of the road expect to practically eliminate the danger of drifting sands by plotting it so that most of the dunes will lie on its west.

The personnel necessary to the operation of the trans-Sahara line would be much less numerous per mile than that required on a railway in America or Europe, because stops would be few in the desert regions. The plans of M. Sabatier include the establishment as soon as practicable of a training school in Algeria which in two years would be able to graduate native apprentices for the trains, shops and stations.

The Minister of Colonies stated a few days ago that he believed the line could count on an annual traffic of 70,000 passengers and 300,000 tons of freight almost from the beginning.

The country of the Sudan has an area of about 772,000 square miles. It contains only some 7,000,000 inhabitants, fewer than ten to the square mile. In contrast to this the irrigated land in the delta of the Nile, with soil and climate said to resemble closely those of the Niger Valley, supports a population of almost a thousand to the square mile. The ground inundated each year by the floods of the Niger and the lesser streams of the valley for centuries has been accumulating a deposit of rich alluvial earth like that along the margin of the Nile, similarly formed, which has been so prolific since before the days recorded by history.

The French Ministry of Colonies wishes to do now in the Sudan what the Egyptians did thousands of years ago with such extraordinary success. It already has made a beginning on what it intends to build gradually in a long period of years into a great system of irrigation canals.

An essential condition to the cultivation of this new Garden of Eden is the provision of the most attractive living conditions possible, to attract and hold European colonists as well as the natives. Thus, if there were no other motive, enlightened selfishness stimulates the Ministry of Colonies in planning the Sudan's future to think of pleasant villages and towns and cities scattered through the Valley of the Niger, fed by rich farms around them and working up in their factories the products of those farms into exportable goods for France and the world, with schools, colleges, hospitals and places of entertainment for natives and Europeans—a second France in the midst of Africa.

VOLUNTEER FIRE FIGHTER OF 1851 STILL PARADES

Dennis Shane, Aged 93 Years, Recalls the Time When the "Old Maid" Company Ran to the Barnum Museum Fire, Dragging the Pumping Engine by Hand.

FOR seventy-two years Dennis Shane has not missed marching in a Volunteer Firemen's parade, if the parade was in the vicinity of New York. Dennis was 93 years old last Spring.

This oldest living volunteer fireman was found the other day at East Rockaway, busily shingling his little house. His four-score and thirteen years have left him slightly stooped, but he can still work atop a scaffolding, as he worked atop a fire ladder back in the '50s, when the safety of New York homes and shops depended on the volunteer firemen. It was Dennis Shane's company that fought the famous Barnum Museum fire at Broadway and Ann Street, which old-timers still talk about.

Even when Dennis was a small boy he was keen for parades. At the age of 11 he ran away from home to carry a torch in the James K. Polk festivities.

"I was covered with oil from my head to my heels," says he, recalling his youthful participation in that torchlight procession of 1842. "And I remember that when we stopped marching it was 3 o'clock in the morning. I didn't know where I was, and I was so tired I didn't care. A policeman asked me how far I was from home, but I couldn't tell him. Be sure I caught it when I reached home at last."

Born in the old Sixth Ward, where Chinatown now stretches its alluring signs before stranger eyes, young Shane played with other boys of his age along the banks of the East River.

"In those days the East River was a good deal wider than it is today. It reached almost to Fourth Avenue. We used to fish for striped bass off Hell Gate and go on picnics up Jones's Wood way at Seventieth Street and Second Avenue. There wasn't much in that vicinity then but goats and shanties. The stage took us up there for 3 cents."

At 21 Shane joined the "Old Maids," the volunteer firemen of his neighborhood. It was always nip and tuck among the fire-fighting companies in those days to see which one would be first at a fire. But nothing, he claims, could pass the "Old Maid," as their engine was named. She was a fast one. The volunteers kept their clothes ready to jump into, much as do the firemen of today. "Pants and boots together," Dennis puts it.

The fire hose in the early days was made of leather and this hose came in 100-foot lengths. Often much manipulation was needed to make the hose stream reach the flames. And the hand pump was hard work.

"But it was good sport. Some nights we turned out two or three times. There was the Hague Street fire, the old Barnum Museum, the Jennings clothing store, the Crystal Palace—all big fires. One of the most stubborn fires I remember was the ship General Walker. She was loaded with cotton and ready to leave for the Pacific Coast, when a blast started in the hold. We worked on that boat for three days, but couldn't put out the fire. The ship was finally scuttled and sent to the bottom."

No telephones or still alarms roused the volunteer fireman of 1850. The bells on City Hall, the old Post Office, Houston Street Market and other buildings wakened them. Prancing horses were no part of the equipment. The men seized the ropes and dragged the engines as fast as humanly possible to the scene of danger. There were accidents and there were jealousies. Rival factions in the district where Dennis Shane lived were the "Bowery Boys" and the "Dead Rabbits." They were anxious of each other's prestige and often came to blows.

It is a city very different from the New York of today that Dennis Shane remembers. The old race track, Union Course, in Brooklyn, was the Mecca for those of sporting tastes. There Flora Temple, Mountain Boy, Golden Maid, General Butler and American Girl competed for honors and lots of money changed hands. It was a man's sport, according to Shane. Few women went to those early races.

Baseball was a popular game then as now. The Yankees and Giants of seventy years ago were the Mutuals and the Atlantics, who used to play in the old ball park in Hoboken. The games were free, and no million-dollar stadium protected the first followers of the great American sport. Even the theatres were quite within reach of the purse of the small boy.

"Twelve cents was the most I ever paid for a seat in the pit," said Dennis Shane, telling of the early theatre on the Bowery. "And the grocery stores all sold gin and whisky for 3 cents a glass."

Dennis Shane learned the carpentry trade at 111 South Street more than seventy years ago. Most of his early work was done on the boats along the waterfront. He made spars and pump heads. At his East Rockaway home he has two boats that he made to go fishing in when he first moved out there years ago.

"But I am too old to go fishing now," he said, running his hands along the side of the battered dories. It was the only time in the interview that Dennis intimated he was growing old. He added that he had bought the little house when he resigned as engineer of Hunter College. He was at the college for a quarter of a century, and remembers Mr. Hunter as "a wonderful man."

Mr. Shane is practically a teetotaler, but he does not believe in prohibition. He says he has always voted the Democratic ticket, but he would desert his party rather than vote for a prohibitionist.

He attributes no small part of his good health to his temperateness in eating and to the fact that he uses meat sparingly. He has his breakfast at 7 o'clock, Summer and Winter, and goes to bed between 9 and 10. A short sick spell last March is about the only time Dennis Shane can remember of being confined to his bed. Rheumatism is unknown to him; in fact, he has few of the maladies of the aged.

His little plot of ground keeps him pretty busy, he said, and he apologized for the long grass. He would cut it as soon as he finished shingling his house. That he was doing this shingling all by himself at the age of 93 did not appear unusual to this descendant of hardy Irish stock. In fact, he seemed to enjoy shingling more than talking, for he had gotten down from the scaffolding reluctantly when his visitor arrived. He came forward with a hammer in one hand, a ready nail in the other, and sat down on one of the old dories. But when he finally launched into early reminiscences he put the nail back in the pocket of his carpenter's apron. The interest in shingling was receding a little. That was when he began to chuckle at the thought of the first licking his schoolmaster had given him.

"He put me on the back of a bigger boy, I remember, and he gave me a good thrashing. I suppose I deserved it. I can't remember now what I'd done, but I was an awful little fellow." Mr. Shane is still sort of a "little fellow." He is rather frail and does not stand much over five feet one or two inches. But it was the memory of the "first licking" that slowly called back the memory of those other pranks of other days. The faded blue eyes twinkled when he told some of the stories, and by the time he said good-bye he had forgotten all about the shingling. He said, too, that not one of his old cronies was left.

Dennis marched in the parade at Long Beach last week and expects to participate in the one that East Rockaway is planning for the 25th of this month. His historic red shirt is all ready for the occasion, he says. He is Honorary President of the Volunteer Firemen of East Rockaway.

WAYSIDE INN SAVED; LONGFELLOW SHRINE

BOUGHT BY HENRY FORD

LONG IN SINGLE FAMILY

Howes Opened and Ran Hostelry for Generations—Will Become a Museum Now.

HENRY FORD, who looks upon history with at least suspicion, nevertheless has just made it possible to preserve a quaint American historical landmark, Longfellow's Wayside Inn, near Boston.

Our historic inns, like old romances, have a lingering charm. They carry one back to eventful and stirring periods of American life, to the days of struggle for establishment and then for liberty. Within the walls of such places as the Wayside Inn have been enacted comedies and tragedies that are closely woven with our own.

Those of us—and there are many of us left—who love the flavor of the days when the stagecoach ran between New York and Boston will easily recall that the inn at Sudbury was made famous by Longfellow in his "Tales of a Wayside Inn." Its historic relics and antiques are reputed to be worth $200,000. The famous hostelry soon will close its doors to the wayfarer and become a museum. Mrs. Edward E. Lemon, widow of the last landlord and hostess since 1860, has been in control of the inn since his death, four years ago. Henry Ford had visited it frequently, and decided to acquire the tavern, so that future generations also might glimpse the past through its doors.

Sudbury, like many of the New England towns in the early days, was a great tavern centre. Longfellow was guilty of no discourtesy when he referred to his good landlord Howe's tavern as "a" wayside inn, for it was but one of the quaint places in the town where cheer might be had. It was the poet's genius that raised the inn from obscurity and made it the wayside inn of the classical world.

The site itself is quaint and picturesque. This was one of the first towns settled by the Puritans. Among the passengers who sailed on the "good ship Confidence" was one Rev. Edward Browne, who as early as 1638 settled in the wilderness with some of his English friends, and named the place for his Buffleksbye childhood home. The soil was rich and the Puritans soon found themselves possessed of verdant acres. John Howe, who had been a glover in England, found there was but a small market for gloves, so that as early as 1661 the erstwhile glover turned his attention to the calling of a "tavern keeper."

To be an innkeeper in these days did not merely require a certain amount of political influence and the payment of license fees. In Connecticut as well as in Massachusetts and New Hampshire, recommendation by the Selectmen and grand jurors of the town was necessary. A license was granted only at the discretion of the Court of Common Pleas. Extreme precaution was exercised so as to provide for the safety and comfort of guests. No pains were spared to prevent vicious men from following the calling, with the result that an innkeeper not only was a man of no mean station but often held the office of Magistrate or Squire.

Hosts Were Men of Worth.

There is an old household tale told at the firesides of New England, bearing evidence that the landlord Howe assuredly was a man of character. His Marlborough house was in close proximity to an Indian settlement. This brought him into intimate contact with the redskins. His character and sense of justice soon won their confidence and many of their disputes were brought to him for arbitration. It is told that one day a controversy arose regarding a pumpkin vine which had found root on the ground of one Indian while it bore fruit on that of another. The case was placed before the Magistrate. With Solomonesque sagacity he ordered that a knife be brought and divided the offending pumpkin into two equal halves, giving a like proportion to each claimant.

However, it is not the inn of John Howe that is celebrated in Longfellow's poem. The sign of this tavern was that of a "Black Horse." It is situated in Marlborough. "The Wayside Inn" was an enterprise carried on by his grandson. The early authorities state that David Howe opened his doors to the public in 1714, but, be that as it may, it was in full swing two years later. According to Sewall, the diarist, he started for Springfield with a friend on the twenty-seventh of April, 1716, and "treated at N. Sparhawk's and got to Howe's in Sudbury about one-half hour before the sun."

Homer Rogers, who purchased the estate after the decease of the last Howe, describes the original house as a small one, and it has been generally supposed that the "L" in the rear of the present structure represented the old part. At the death of David Howe in 1746 the tavern passed into the hands of his son Ezekiel, who enlarged the buildings as the demand for lodgings increased. At that time travel moved westward from Boston over the highway upon which the inn stands. The stage coach passengers halted for a night's rest. As described in Longfellow's poem, a prancing, fiery steed of brilliant argent hung over the doors of the inn, distinguishing it from the "Black Horse" of the Howe tavern of Marlborough. The first three owners had whittled out their initials on the rear of this flamboyant sign, dating from 1686 to 1796.

During the time that Ezekiel Howe was landlord, the menu at the tavern was the best to be found in New England and the prices were exceedingly modest, according to our ideas. For 15 cents the best "mug of Indian flip" could be had. A night's lodging cost only a few cents. A good New England dinner averaged 20 cents and supper and breakfast could be obtained for 15 cents each.

The sympathy of the tap-room cast a warm cordiality over wayside entertainment. At the Wayside Inn, in one corner over the bar, there was a wooden "portcullis" raised according to the demand for liquid comfort. The floor is worn where the good fellows of a century and a half ago were wont to toast each his own. Overhead are heavy oaken timbers dating back to days when flip was served out of a silver tankard. Upstairs were the rooms occupied by the people of "no importance." The State chamber, with its quaint wallpaper of bluebells, once used by Lafayette on his journey to Boston in 1824, is today a nation's shrine. In the garret above were the slave quarters, and at times when invasion by the Redskins was feared these served as hiding places for grain. One of the upper rooms was used as a dance hall. There clings to it, even today, an air reminiscent of lavender and old lace, of shy maidens and crinolines. It is whispered that at night the soft, low melodies of another age may be heard and the pitpat of a dainty satin slipper beats time to the minuet.

One landlord, Ezekiel Howe, was a Lieutenant Colonel of the Fourth Regimen of the Middlesex County militia. He was made a Colonel by the Legislature, which commission he held with distinction until his resignation in 1779. The roster of the army of those stirring days will show that 322 Sudbury men were in service at Concord and Lexington.

Inspired Longfellow.

Adam Howe, the Colonel's third son, who with the Colonel's granddaughter, Hesphah Brown, had been mentioned as residuary legatees, kept the tavern until 1830, when he was succeeded by his son, Lyman Howe, during whose hostship the "Tales of a Wayside Inn" were written. Adam Howe spent a considerable portion of his time in tracing his family-tree to the English nobility, but it was during the tenure of his son that undying lustre was added to the family coat-of-arms. On the death of Lyman Howe, no male descendants surviving, the tavern passed into other hands. The days of the stage coach likewise were numbered, for the iron horse had supplanted it. Longfellow, in his diary of that period, wrote: "Drive with Fields to the old 'Red Horse' Tavern in Sudbury—alas! no longer an inn! • • • and until now in the family of the Howes. • • • "

Much interest attaches to the writing of Longfellow's "Tales of a Wayside Inn," the first series of which was published in 1863. The story of its writing as told in 1870 by Ole Bull, the Norwegian violinist, who figures in the tales, to August Reymert, a New York attorney, is worthy of record.

"Ole Bull," said Mr. Reymert, "was a frequent visitor at the home of my uncle, the late James D. Reymert, in the '50s. And Ole Bull became an intimate friend of mine. He told me that either in November or December he and other friends had been traveling in the stage coach and stopped at the Wayside Inn in Sudbury to seek shelter from a snowstorm. The storm raged for two days, making further progress impossible. There the little party, Ole Bull among them, sought the comfort of the blazing hearth. The group included a theologian, a Spanish Jew, a Sicilian, a young musician (Ole Bull) and a young American poet—Longfellow. All of them were men of travel, culture and experience. They spent the time in chatting, seeking the comfort of the tap-room and recounting their adventures. Between times Ole Bull played on his Antonius Stradivarius, later sold in London for a fabulous price. Longfellow has left us these lines of that time:

> Before the blazing fire of wood,
> Erect the rapt musician stood,
> And ever and anon he bent
> His head upon his instrument
> And seemed to listen, till he caught
> Confessions of its secret thought—
> The joy, the triumph, the lament,
> The exultation and the pain;
> Then by the magic of his art
> He soothed the throbbings of its heart
> And lulled it into peace again.

Many of the early furnishings of the Wayside Inn are missing, among them the little desk in the tap-room where the scars of the strangers was settled. At least the inn is to be preserved.

GOMPERS FAILS AS LEADER, SAYS EUROPEAN LABORITE

BIG OPPORTUNITY MISSED

Neglect of Unskilled Workmen One of Chief Errors

WORKER'S WIFE NEGLECTED

By WILLIAM ATHERTON DU PUY.

LABOR organization has gone more slowly in the United States than in any other industrial country in the world, Jan Oudegeest told me. "It has hesitated, floundered, almost failed. It has done this because of its methods and its policies. In the first place, it has refused to get properly into politics. It has failed to take a leaf out of the book of Europe and organize a labor party. It has ignored the woman—failed to make trade unionism attractive to the wife of the worker. It has been improperly led by Samuel Gompers."

To be told these things bluntly by a world labor official and authority was quite a jolt. We Americans get our only impressions of organized labor from the American Federation of Labor. We have little or nothing with which to measure its methods and results. But here I was over in Europe going about in an attempt to get new light on problems that might be interesting in America.

And there was the problem of organized labor from the world standpoint. Aside from the American end of the game, I wanted to know whether organized labor was gaining or losing strength in these times of world crisis. I got to asking myself sweepingly where there was a man strategically situated with a telescope that he could swing around like the street corner astronomer from here to there for a good look at this world labor question.

And at about this time there was a World Labor Conference up in Geneva, held under the auspices of the International Labor Organization, and experts were gathering from Japan, South Africa, Finland, Uruguay, Canada; from almost everywhere in fact, for there are fifty-five nations signed up for participation in this movement to get the world around a table for the discussion of those problems of labor and industry that are so vital to it. The charter for the International Labor Organization was written at Versailles in the time of treaty making and it is a relative of the League of Nations though not directed by that organization. Its charter says that its business is to establish "social justice" as a guarantee to peace. It has a "Labor Office" in Geneva where 350 people are engaged in research and administrative tasks. This annual conference is the big event.

Jan Oudegeest the Man.

At Geneva I asked many people who was the great authority who could paint me the picture of organized labor in being. The consensus of opinion was that Jan Oudegeest was the man. He knew more about trade unionism than any man in the world, it was said. Was he not a Secretary of the International Federation of Trade Unions, with headquarters in Amsterdam and 20,000,000 members scattered about the world? Had he not organized the Dutch Federation of Trade Unions back in 1906, become its Secretary, and had he not been constantly in the movement ever since? Oudegeest, I found, is a stocky, middle-aged Dutchman, with blue eyes, bristly white hair, a quizzical smile, and a mellow pipe. He had begun his working life in a railroad office at the age of 11 and had long functioned as a clerk. But for twenty years he had been fighting those battles of trade union organization which have a way of being very intense whether they be against the enemy without or leaders of divergent views within.

"It is not generally recognized," Mr. Oudegeest said, "that the trade union movement is, after all, comparatively young. England may be said to have mothered it and the birth may be placed somewhere back about 1830. So slowly did it grow that it was a half century before it appeared in the United States, which was the second important country to take it up. Still it was a decade before the movement took form in Continental Europe, where trade unions began to be recognized about 1890, so it appears that the trade union movement on the Continent is but little more than thirty years old.

"Despite the fact that it came into being in Continental Europe later than in England or America, it has grown more rapidly there than it has elsewhere. If one examines the figures he will find that in Germany, which has a population of sixty million people, there are today some nine million trade unionists. Thus does organized labor amount to almost 15 per cent. of the German population. In England, where the population is about forty millions, there are six million trade unionists, or about 15 per cent. In Holland, with a population of six millions, there are 700,000 organized workers, or about 12 per cent. Finally, in the United States, which has more than 100 million people, there are scarcely four million trade unionists, or less than 4 per cent."

"How do you explain," I asked, "this failure of the trade unionist movement to develop as rapidly in America as in Europe?"

"There are a number of reasons," Mr. Oudegeest answered, "why organized labor has developed slowly from a numerical standpoint in the United States. For a long time the policy in the United States was that only the most skilled workers should be admitted into the union. For a long time it was true that organized workers received twice the wages in the United States of the unorganized workers. Realizing this advantage, it was with reluctance that they admitted less highly skilled individuals into their membership. They made almost no provision, in fact, for organizing unskilled workers. This principle not only kept numbers small, but created intensities of feeling as between the organized and the unorganized workers. Evidences of the survival of that feeling may still be detected in the United States.

"A second reason, and I think the most important reason, for the failure of organized labor to develop rapidly in America is the fact that it has not been made to appeal to the women. To the wife of the worker in America, membership in the union has meant the possibility of his being called out on strike, with the result that the family income might be cut off at any time. There was no compensation offered which would, in the mind of the woman, adequately offset this danger. In Europe, on the contrary, particularly in Continental Europe, there have been quite adequate compensations. In Europe the idea of unemployment insurance and health insurance was early developed. These guarantees of family funds in emergencies proved to be very attractive to the worker's wife. She found security in the fact that her husband was a member of the union, while the American wife found no security in the same fact.

Unskilled Labor Neglected.

"A third observation which I would make of the administration of trade unions in America is the fact that they have failed adequately to organize that great mass of unskilled labor which has gone to America from Europe. The emigrant has been allowed to arrive in the United States, and to fall into the hands of private employment agencies for exploitation. The European system of employment agencies maintained by the unions themselves, or by the municipalities, would have absorbed these unskilled workers, would have prevented their exploitation, and would have welded them to the organization.

"Further than this there is another great difference in the attitude of organized labor in Europe and in America. In Europe labor is actively in politics. There is a Labor Party in most of the industrial nations in Europe. Those nations have found that the organization of a Labor Party was the effective means of gaining the ends they sought. The experience of England was typical. In England there were the two chief parties, the Whigs and the Tories, which compare quite closely with the two important parties, the Democrats and the Republicans, in the United States. In this situation organized labor in England formed the Labor Party, and, working through that party, it has been able to accomplish much. I maintain that history proves the fallacy of the position assumed by organized labor in the United States, and I maintain that it will eventually organize a separate and independent political party, and through that party make itself felt to a much greater extent than at present."

"Is the strength of the International Federation of Trade Unions being materially weakened," I asked Mr. Oudegeest, "by the distressing industrial situation which exists in the world today?

"We have in our organization at the present moment," he replied, "despite bad industrial conditions, about 20,000,000 organized workers. This is three times as great a membership as we had in 1914. To be sure, in 1919 our membership ran as high as 23,000,000. Thus we gained some 14,000,000 during the war period, and of those 14,000,000 we have lost 3,000,000. This gives a net gain of 11,000,000, and makes our strength about three times what it was before the war. Going back two decades, therefore, we find that twenty years ago our membership was about one-tenth what it is today. So does it become obvious that organized labor has gained overwhelmingly as the decades have passed. From my point of view we have but just demonstrated the need of organization for the advancement of conditions in the working world and our growth should be steady and strong from now on."

"And this International Labor Organization, just where does it fit into the workers' scheme?" was asked.

"The International Labor Organization," Mr. Oudegeest replied, "is not exclusively the instrument of labor. Its conference, its governing body, and its commissions are made up of representatives of the nations that compose it on the basis of two representatives of the Government, one representative of the workers and one representative of the employers. Its purpose is to study the labor question as much from the industrial viewpoint and the Government viewpoint as from the labor viewpoint. It brings the interested parties together for a discussion of those problems that are vital to all of them.

"The International Labor Office furnishes a medium through which certain matters can be handled that are matters of common interest to the Governments. There is a section in the International Labor Office, for example, the business of which is to compile each year all the important labor laws that are passed by all the nations of the world, to translate them into the three principal languages of the world, English, French and German, to print them, and make them available to all the world. This means that any man, anywhere, who wants to write a factory inspection law, may have for his guidance all that has gone before.

The Great Purpose.

"There is, however, an infinitely great purpose made possible through the establishment of the International Labor Office. Consider, for example, the effect that it may have toward improving the industrial relations that exist between two such countries as the United States and Japan. From the standpoint of the condition of its labor, the United States may properly be classed as an advanced country, and Japan may be classed as a backward country. Workers in the United States are paid wages many times as great as those paid in Japan, and live upon a scale many times as expensive.

"The United States does not admit Japanese workers for fear that doing so would lower the standard of her own people. She does not admit without duty the product of the workers in Japan because this would mean competition on the part of her own workers with this people who are low in the scale of wage earners. The United States is at a great disadvantage when she comes to compete with Japanese cheap labor products in the markets of the world. The problem has seemed without solution.

"Now appears a world agency which offers progress toward the solution of that problem. One of the primary purposes of the International Labor Office is to bring up the condition of the workers in backward countries to the point where it approximates that of the condition of the workers in the advanced country. This means that it will tend steadily to improve sanitary conditions, shorten hours of labor, remove the competition of child labor, to regulate the working of women, to increase wages in those countries.

"All of this will tend to increase the cost of labor in the backward countries and to bring that labor cost up toward the corresponding cost in the advanced countries. Every degree to which this is accomplished will relieve the advanced countries of just that much disadvantage in meeting labor competition. The tendency will be always toward the production of common standards of working throughout the world with the primary studendous improvement in the conditions of backward people, and a second relief in competition among those nations that are attempting to do justice to those who toil.

"Then there is sure to come another stupendous result which is commonly overlooked in considering this subject. If the workers of Japan come to a better scale of living, earn twice the money they get today, they will become greater consumers. If they wear better clothes, for example, spend twice the money for those clothes, they must buy those close somewhere. Thus do they create a market for clothes. Double the wages of the hordes of people who work in backward countries, and double the consumption of those people, and you stupendously increase the markets of the world.

"Thus does it appear that a world agency, founded for the betterment of the conditions of people who work, may come to be a stupendous boon to industry as well as to humanity."

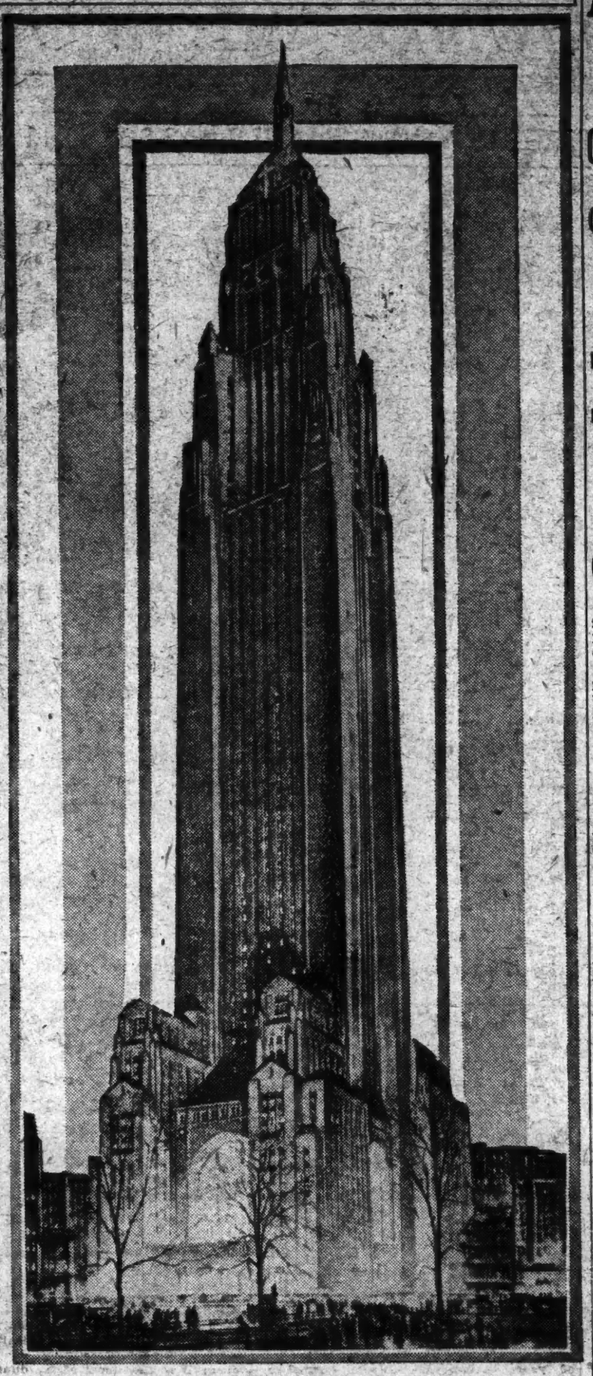
RUSSIAN INDUSTRY LAGS.

RECENT statistics prepared in Russia indicate a surprisingly rapid shrinkage in the number of workers employed in manufacturing and mining. Today little more than one-half as many men are employed as in 1921, and but one-third as many as in 1917. The figures include all those employed in industries by the State or under State control or those leased by the State. The total employed in all industries excepting small shops was less than 2,000,000.

PROPOSED 80-STORY BUILDING



This Plan Was Drawn by Bertram Grosvenor Goodhue for a Building to Surpass all Other Skyscrapers in Number of Floors, to Stand on Madison Square. Is Interesting as Showing the Possibilites in Towering Buildings.

NO LIMIT NOW IN SIGHT TO FUTURE SKYSCRAPERS

HOW tall can a building be? How large can it be? Should it be strictly utilitarian or should large sums be spent to make it an object of beauty as well as genuinely useful and thoroughly practical?

Bertram Grosvenor Goodhue has conceived of a proposed building on the site of Madison Square Garden eighty stories high. The Woolworth Building, highest commercial structure in the world, is fifty-eight stories.

To the second question the answer seems to be, "As large as practical." Statements have been made that the new General Motors Corporation Building in Detroit and the proposed Union Trust Company building in Cleveland will be larger than any building in New York.

It is interesting to examine the facts. The size of a building is usually determined by, the amount of rentable floor area. The Equitable building in New York is still the largest office building in the United States, with 1,237,000 square feet of rentable floor area. The Union Trust Company building in Cleveland is second with 1,173,000 square feet, the General Motors building in Detroit is third with 1,054,685 feet and the new Standard Oil Company building at 26 Broadway, when completed, is expected to be the fourth largest building, with a floor area of 577,127 square feet. The Woolworth is fifth, with 550,000 square feet.

So far as New York is concerned the whole tendency is toward enormous buildings. For example, the New York Telephone Company plans to spend $11,200,000 for its downtown house. This building will be 29 stories high, covering the block bounded by West, Barclay, Washington and Vesey Streets. For 17 stories the building will cover an entire block and have 36,000 square feet on the streets for stores. The upper twelve floors will be set back in tower form in accordance with the zoning laws.

As to the third question, there can be no doubt that the whole tendency in building today is toward producing something restful to the eye as well as something strictly utilitarian. The Union Trust Company Building in Cleveland probably is an exception to the general tendency. This enormous building is perfectly square. It lacks the decorative features which mark such buildings as the Chicago Temple Building in Chicago, one of the most beautiful buildings in America today. This building, which is 21 stories high, was built by the Chicago Methodist Episcopal Church and Society, and although a downtown office building, houses one of the finest churches in the city.

The General Motors Corporation Building in Detroit, one of the great buildings of America, is attractively built and ideally arranged. But it is such a structure as the new Standard Oil Company Building at 26 Broadway which compels one to stop and admire.

The Chicago Tribune has not only one of the finest equipped newspaper plants in the United States but also one of the most attractive. The design for this building was selected at the conclusion of a $50,000 prize contest. In the Wrigley Building, Chicago has another imposing structure. But in the Woolworth Building New York still has the most remarkable building of all.

It is a curious fact that the Woolworth Building, although not the largest, has the most tenants—almost 14,000. The Equitable has 12,000, the General Motors 6,000 and the Union Trust will have about the same number.

The Equitable Building is equipped with 63 elevators, the Woolworth has 29, the Union Trust 28 and the General Motors 27. In the Equitable Building almost 90,000 people use its elevators daily.

Washing the windows of great skyscrapers like these four is a considerable job. The Equitable, for example, has 11,000 panes and but ten men are used to wash them. Imagine ten men walking to work and stopping to gaze at the Equitable Building and remarking, "All we have to do is wash those windows." Their job is never finished. All of the windows in the General Motors Building swing in the middle, so that they may be cleaned on both sides by men standing inside.

The Woolworth Building, of course, is the world's tallest office building. Its tower reaches 792 feet. The Equitable Building is 545 feet high. The Woolworth also has the most stories. It is 58 stories high, while the Equitable is 40, the Union Trust and the General Motors 15.

Forty-eight hundred telephones are installed in the Equitable Building. Sixty-three thousand pieces of mail are received, on an average, every day, and 88,000 pieces of mail are sent out.

The foundation of the Woolworth Building goes down 110 feet below the street level. The Equitable Building has a 90-foot foundation. The Woolworth has the fastest elevators in the world. The tenants are assured of one-half minute service. Two elevators rise from the ground to the fifty-fourth floor in exactly one minute. The elevators are so constructed that if a car should get lodged between floors it would be possible to run a car up alongside, open the doors from one elevator into the other, remove the passengers and transport them to safety.

To determine the utility of the air cushions in the Woolworth Building, a test was made by loading an elevator with 7,000 pounds of material and dropping it from the forty-fifth floor with all safety devices and cables removed. When this elevator reached bottom, its load was unharmed; the vibration being so slight that even a glass of water which it carried remained unspilled.

Many an architect's drawing which is now represented in steel and brick and mortar, was at one time described as an architect's dream. But still the architect dreams and as time goes on American cities see their buildings become more and more beautiful and, what is equally noteworthy, more and more utilitarian.

CHINESE RESENT AUTOCRACY

Object to Paying Taxes to Arm Their Military Oppressors

MAY ACCEPT SOVIET HELP

By FLETCHER S. BROCKMAN.

CHINA would be unified within six months, the military leaders would be overthrown and a constitutional Government would be established if it were not for the interference of the foreign powers," says Dr. Sun Yat-sen, President of the South China Republic.

"If the foreign nations persist in their present attitude," he adds, "there will be a great war in China within a year—a war that may involve much of the rest of the world."

Dr. Sun has recently returned to Canton. I went to see him in his headquarters at the Agricultural College. Although I was accompanied by his brother-in-law and a member of his staff, we were challenged at every door. A spy had been caught within the headquarters the day before.

The President, in a sack suit, entered the reception hall with the brisk step of an American business man, took his seat at the head of a long table, offered me one by his side and waited for the interview to begin. There was none of the elaborate ceremony customary among Chinese officials, none of the pleasant inquiries concerning my family, which one always expects in such interviews in China. His attitude was, "What can I do for you today?"

Dr. Sun is perhaps a little past 50 years of age. He is of moderate height, has none of the obesity of middle age and gives no indication of luxurious living. He is clean-shaven, except for a closely cropped mustache.

In view of his trying experiences of the past three years, I expected to find him greatly aged and discouraged. But he kept a smile on his face during most of my visit and gave no indication of having been under a heavy strain. His eyes are small and are the most expressive feature of his face. Once, when something was said that suggested his betrayal by General Cheng Chin Ming, his former General and intimate colleague, I could read in the expression of his eyes something of the tragic history of his many years of high adventure.

Dr. Sun's Tempestuous Life.

This alert, keen, business-like man risked his life in Canton more than twenty-five years ago, when, as a young man, he led an unsuccessful revolution against what then seemed the all-powerful Manchu dynasty. He fled to England, was captured in London and made a prisoner in the Chinese Legation, escaped, lived for years an exile in Singapore, Japan and the United States, came back to China and was elected its Provisional President. He saw the betrayal of the republic by Yuan Shih-kai, attempted an expedition against Yuan, was defeated and had to flee to Japan, witnessed the failure of Yuan's attempt to make himself Emperor, then returned again to establish himself as President of the South China Republic. Betrayed by the General in charge of his forces, he escaped, disguised as a coolie, to one of his own gunboats.

The lines in his face show little of all this tragedy and adventure, but I could imagine I saw it mirrored in his dark and brilliant eyes.

"What about the present situation in China, Dr. Sun?" I asked. "The American people know you as they know no other Chinese. Your answer to this question will be appreciated."

"The situation is complex," he replied. "The real trouble is that China is not an independent country. She is the victim of foreign countries. She is really in a worse condition than Korea or Formosa. They have one master; we have many. Their master dominates them, but has important responsibilities for the people who are under subjection. China is equally dominated by the outside, but her masters rule without accepting any responsibility.

"If the foreign countries will let us alone, China will have her affairs in shape within six months. The foreign nations have pursued the disastrous policy of endowing a corrupt and inefficient clique in Peking and insisting upon the fiction of calling it a Government. America in particular must accept responsibility for our present débâcle.

"It was America that led us into the European War. Up to that time we had one responsible Government. It was the act of the Tuan Chi-jui Government in getting us into the war that created the first division between North and South."

"But did not the Washington conference improve China's foreign relations and stay the assaults upon its sovereignty?" I asked.

Autocracy Versus Democracy.

"We have not yet reaped any advantage from the Washington Conference," he replied. "The foreign countries have not ceased since this conference to interfere with our internal affairs. They have endowed the Peking Government. The Peking Government could not stand twenty-four hours without the backing it receives from foreign Governments. Peking has no hold upon the people. Its only revenue comes from the maritime customs and the salt gabel.

"The military leaders and Tuchuns, who are imposing upon us a great military establishment and are the acknowledged curse of the country, would fall immediately if they were not supported by Peking. The people could easily overthrow the whole military system if it were not for this backing of foreign countries. The Peking Government would be starved out at once. It can collect no taxes from the provinces; it lives entirely upon foreign-collected money.

"The foreign countries have blindly and persistently declined to recognize the Southern Government, which is really the de jure Government; although Peking is the de facto Government. Six provinces already are loyal to the South. The revenue from the maritime customs and part of that from the salt gabel, all of which is collected by the power of foreign countries, is not used for the good of the people from whom it is collected. It goes to Peking, and a considerable proportion of it is used to fight us. The foreign powers are helping the autocratic and bureaucratic Peking Government to crush the democratic Southern Government by taking these taxes out of South China and turning them over to Peking.

"We of the South have fought long for the recognition of the foreign countries, but now we despair of this. We do not ask it. What we do ask is that the foreign countries shall at least withdraw their support from the Peking Government. We do not ask these nations to collect the taxes from our people and turn them back to us. We ask that they shall collect the taxes, North and South, and hold them until we Chinese ourselves can straighten out our internal affairs and establish one Government that will truly represent the Chinese people. The Chinese people are not divided. The division exists among a few military leaders.

"What are we Chinese to do? We cannot oppose the united policy of the leading powers. If even a democratic country like America is unwilling to throw her influence on the side of democracy in China, at least let her take her hands off our affairs."

"You speak of your Government as being democratic," I said, "yet you have combined forces with General Chang Tso-Lin of Manchuria. It has confused your friends to see you joining with a known autocrat. Do you not stand for opposite things?"

Would Take Soviet Help.

"I have combined with him for the same reason that America combined with Japan in the war against Germany. America is a democratic country; Japan autocratic. You united for the overthrow of a common enemy. General Chang and I have the same enemy, and I will take him—or anybody else who will help me—into the combination to overthrow Peking.

"We have lost hope of help from America, England, France or any other of the great powers. The only country that shows any signs of helping us in the South is the Soviet Government of Russia."

"Do you call the Soviets democratic?" I asked.

"I do not care what they are," he replied, without hesitation, "if they are willing to back me against Peking."

"What if there is no hope of getting the foreign countries to change their policy toward China?"

"If the foreign nations will change their policy," Dr. Sun answered, "we shall bring about the unification of China without war. If they persist in their policy there will be a great war in China within a year—a war that may involve much of the rest of the world. The people know what they want, and they will get it sooner or later. The Chinese are not a warlike people. We want to settle our difficulties in a peaceful way. Intervention by the foreign powers is compelling us to resort to the use of force. Remember, the Chinese people are united. It is only a foreign-fed Government that creates division among us."

I tried to get Dr. Sun to go into some details as to how the military leaders would be overthrown, and what steps for unification would be taken if the policy of the foreign countries should remain unchanged. But he parried every question. Politely and definitely he took the attitude: "This is our own affair, and we are attending to it in our way. What I wish to talk with you about is the part of the situation that foreigners could remedy, namely, their interference with our internal affairs."

This frank statement of the case was all that he cared to make, and when it was completed it was evident that he considered the interview ended.

In the Dragon's Mouth

The meeting with Dr. Sun shows clearly the character of a man who has exerted a powerful influence upon Chinese history in the last fifteen years and seems likely to be potent in determining its future for the next decade.

Dr. Sun is brave almost to the point of recklessness. His capital city is in the hands of a General from Yunnan, with a few thousand troops turned out of their own province, who made their way across Kwang-si and took Canton by force. They have recognized Dr. Sun's leadership, but have his person really in their hands.

Near by is quartered a similar band of semi-outlaws from the Province of Kwang-si, who are united with the Yunnanese forces only in their willingness to recognize for the moment President Sun. Dr. Sun realizes that both of these military leaders are having every possible influence brought to bear upon them by Peking, that they might turn on him at a moment's notice, and that he has not a hundred troops of his own to guard his person. Yet he sits there, in the mouth of the dragon, entirely unafraid.

Dr. D. Z. T. Yui, one of the two delegates appointed by the people to the Washington conference, said to me in discussing Dr. Sun:

"Amid all of the corruption of Chinese officialdom, he has maintained an unsullied reputation for honesty. Millions of dollars have passed through his hands, yet he is poor. He has great confidence in himself and in his ideas. He is a thorough democrat, and is willing to leave the choice to the people, whatever it may be, but he wants to create conditions in which the voice of the people may be heard. He is the idol of the laboring class in South China. The laundry and restaurant men in America, Australia and the Straits Settlements have for years contributed to his support.

"A great student, Dr. Sun receives first copies of all books published in England or America on sociological and political subjects. He has written several books himself. His last book in English, 'The International Development of China,' was brought out also in Chinese. In this work he outlined railways, canals, new cities and mines to be opened, and, in fact, a program for Chinese development for the next five centuries. He takes the position that China will need international co-operation in supplying financial assistance and experts along all lines.

"With his thorough mastery of the needs of his country, Dr. Sun stands alone among Chinese officials. The ordinary official of China does little or no reading and his mind becomes petrified. Dr. Sun keeps his mind sharp and keen."

The prevailing foreign estimate of Dr. Sun has been that he is a dreamer, and therefore dangerous if put in charge of the affairs of the nation. He has at times championed revolutionary social doctrines, some of which he has abandoned as he has gained in experience. Whether or not he is a great executive is impossible to say. He has never been tested. His military career has not been a brilliant one.

There can be little doubt that he has grown in ability and in his hold upon the Chinese people. He is a man to keep an eye upon in the page of China's history now about to be written.

EX-PRESIDENT OF CHINA

Sun Yat-Sen

GUARDING INDUSTRY.

IN a copy of the Providence Gazette issued during the Colonial period and owned by a collector of this city appears an amusing item of local news, which, if literally adhered to, doubtless would have devastated a portion of New England of its household cats. The copy of the paper bears the date of Nov. 28, 1767, and one readily discerns that the residents of that Rhode Island city regarded themselves at the time as loyal subjects of George III. The article reads:

"A number of householders in this town will engage to supply the public with the article of Cat-Skins of American breed, not inferior to British ones, for making Muffs and Tippets. There are at this time a large number of his Majesty's American Cats, finely colored and spotted, who are bad mousers and now ready to be sacrificed for the good purpose of Muffs and Tippets, and it is hoped that all persons who wish well to America will give the preference to his Majesty's Cat-Skins before those of foreign growth.

"As Muffs and Tippets are thought to be of the first importance, it would be well worth the consideration of all lovers of this country whether we ought not to encourage the use and consumption of our own Cat-Skins in preference of all others. The learned aver as that the American Cat-Skins are vastly superior to those of Europe, being of finer fur and more beautifully variegated with spots and streaks."

WORLD WAR TRACED TO SERBIAN COLONEL

MAN BEHIND ASSASSINS

Made Effort Too Late to Avoid Tragedy at Sarajevo

AFTERWARD LOST HIS LIFE

Court-Martialed and Shot in 1917 for Alleged Plan to Kill the Heir Apparent.

LIEUT. COL. DRAGUTIN DIMITRIYEVITCH, former leader of the military party in Serbia and chief opponent of the civilian group led by Premier Nicholas Pashitch, in the Summer of 1914, was the principal character in the plot which resulted in the murders of Serajevo on June 28, 1914, that started the world-wide conflagration, according to Professor Stanoye Stanoyevitch of the University of Belgrade, who has written a pamphlet, "The Murder of Archduke Franz Ferdinand: a Contribution to the History of the Origin of the World War."

Professor Stanoyevitch says that his information was obtained from statements made by persons in close touch with the situation at the time of the murder. His charge cannot be denied by Dimitriyevitch himself, as the latter was court-martialed and shot in 1917; nor can Major Voyislav Tankositch, the right-hand man of Dimitriyevitch, be called as a witness, as he fell in action early in the war.

The Serbian professor's pamphlet, just translated into German and published in Frankfort, confirms the generally accepted theory that the Serbian Government knew nothing about the plot, something admitted even by the leading Austrian statesmen; but it goes further and gives a plausible explanation of what nerved the arm of Gavrio-Prinzep, the boy slayer of Franz Ferdinand and his wife. Hermann Wendel, a German writer well acquainted with Balkan politics, in summarizing Professor Stanoyevitch's work, says:

"In order to make plausible the situation among the Serbs from which developed the thought of killing the most visible representatives of the Danube Monarchy, he outlines with sure strokes a century and a half of Serbian, indeed of South Slavic, development, and shows how the holding down of an elementary popular movement by the dynastic selfishness of the Hapsburgs was bound to exercise an evil, poisonous effect upon the minds of the masses.

"Of course, it was only among the revolutionary youth of the South Slavic part of Austria-Hungary where the ferment of action was working, for two successful, but also costly, wars had inspired all circles of the Kingdom of Serbia with a desire for the longest possible peace. This desire was shared by the officers' corps, in which, since the murder of Alexander and Draga Obrenovitch in 1903, some symptoms inimical to the peaceful development of the State had shown themselves.

Enter the Leader.

"Partly for the protection of their persons and partly also for the safeguarding of their personal interests, the officers participating in the conspiracy later formed an organization that more than once sought to influence the course of domestic politics. But the more the new conditions became firmer, through the development of democratic institutions and the more the attempts at interference by this unconstitutional factor were resisted by the bourgeoisie, the more the group of conspirators retreated to the background of the stage of politics.

"But when the annexation crisis was working mightily upon the souls of all Serbs, the officer-conspirators of 1903 got into action. Because they regarded the patriotic society 'Narodna Odbrana,' which arose in connection with the annexation crisis, as of a purely cultural nature, a number of them in 1911 founded the secret league 'Uyedinyenye ili Smert' (Unity or Death), which soon had 300 members. It was modeled on the Italian Carbonario societies, and, quite in the style of old-fashioned conspiratory romanticism, strove to solve the Serbs' national problem through revolutionary means and acts of terror.

"At the head of this league stood a man who seemed created to be a conspirator. As a 27-year-old Captain, Dragutin Dimitriyevitch had, through his energy on the occasion of massing away with the last of the Obrenovitchs, removed an unexpected obstacle from the road. Since then the gifted and educated officer, who in the meantime had advanced to Lieutenant Colonel on the General Staff, had remained the same restless character. An honest man, a fiery patriot, but also filled with stormy ambition, passionately in favor of secret, underground activities, dogmatic and not free from vanity, he exercised his fascinating power over the younger officers in particular. His most devoted comrade was Major Voyislav Tankositch, who, under a quiet and mild exterior, concealed an unbridled and undisciplined nature and who, as a leader of roving bands in Macedonia, had displayed reckless courage. About political affairs, about the real needs of a State, they both had only faint and vague conceptions, but Dimitriyevitch was very determined in carrying out what he had in his head.

"After the meeting of Franz Ferdinand and Wilhelm II. in Knopiehl, Dimitriyevitch, then Chief of the Information Division of the General Staff, received news from the Russian General Staff to the effect that the Hapsburger and the Hohenzollern, there by the blackening road, had agreed upon an attack by Austro-Hungary upon Serbia, with German backing. Reports that he received from confidential men on the other side of the border about the coming manoeuvres in Bosnia strengthened his conviction that these military exercises were to form the immediate prelude to the planned attack.

Plotting the Murder.

"Longer deliberation caused him to reach the conclusion that only the removal of the Austro-Hungarian heir apparent, whom he regarded as the chief [illegible] could save his unprepared and weary fatherland from the horrors of invasion and defeat. The idea of violence no longer frightened him, for several months before he had already agreed with a Bulgarian revolutionary committee upon an unexecuted attack upon Ferdinand of Coburg, and he had also once before sent a former leader of lawless bands to Vienna for the purpose of murdering Franz Josef or Franz Ferdinand.

"The course of events so willed it that just as he was considering the translation of his thoughts into acts two young men from Bosnia with the same intention came to see Major Tankositch and ask him for advice and aid. With his customary determination, Dimitriyevitch took charge of the matter, had the Bosnians instructed in the use of arms by Tankositch and then sent them to Serajevo. On June 15 the Colonel revealed to a meeting of the Executive Committee of the organization 'Unity or Death' what was going on, giving expressly as the reason for his action the necessity of preventing an attack upon the homeland by the big neighbor. If German war guilt philologists have all too innocently explained the war by Austro-Hungary upon Serbia as 'Prophylaxis against the World War,' in Dimitriyevitch's way of thinking the murder of Franz Ferdinand was 'Prophylaxis against the Austro-Serbian War.'"

"But none of the members of the Executive Committee, except Tankositch, would have anything to do with the deed planned, and they implored Dimitriyevitch to abandon his project. He promised to do so, and 'it appears,' says Stanoyevitch, 'that he made such an attempt, but either it was too late or the plotters in Serajevo would not obey him. Things took their fatal course.'

"But if Dimitriyevitch, as the principal organizer of the attack, was not the very highest, but still was a high officer in an important post, the very fact of his guilt testifies to the complete innocence of the Serbian Government. After both Balkan wars the victorious officers' corps, and above all the 'Unity or Death' society, had become somewhat presumptuous and was striving for influence upon political matters. Especially in the newly-won territory, in South Serbia, there were violent clashes between the military and civilian authorities. An order establishing the superiority of the civilian power had to be recalled under pressure of the secret league, and in the Summer of 1914 Pashitch, the leader of the civil Government, and Dimitriyevitch, chief of the military party, were facing each other as bitter, irreconcilable opponents.

"The conflict continued during the war, and in the Spring of 1917 Dimitriyevitch was court-martialed—on a charge of having organized on the Saloniki front an attempt to murder Alexander, the heir to the throne, and to proclaim a military dictatorship—condemned to death and shot in June."

Mussolini Gets Protest From German Deputies

DER TIROLER of Bolzano, in the heart of the former Trentino Irredento, surrendered to Italy by the Treaty of St. Germain, publishes the text of a memorial addressed to Premier Mussolini by the four German Deputies for the Upper Adige on the regulations for the administration of their district. The authors preface their statement by the remark that they do not expect the Italian Government to change its policy, but that they owe it to history to make a declaration of their views on the situation.

After quoting the strategic reasons for the annexation of the Upper Adige and the promises made by Senator Tittoni in Parliament on Sept. 27, 1919, the report, drawn up by Signor Luzzatti in the Chamber, and the various declarations made by King Victor Emmanuel in his speech from the throne on Dec. 1 of the same year, the German Deputies complain that the policy of the present Government is in contradiction with the lenient policy followed by its predecessors. Under seven heads they voice their complaints as follows:

1. The language question: law and regulations seldom provided with a German translation. 2. Change of place-names: alterations injure international business interests. 3. Right of meeting: non-political educative lectures forbidden. 4. Census: confusion of nationalities. 5. Schools: proposed suppression of the German schools in seven German Communes. 6. The Lowlands: transference of the judicial district of Neumarkt (Egna) to the purely Italian sub-prefecture of Cavalese. 7. Historic traditions: general suppression, including the name "Tyrol," except as a designation of a village and castle near Meran.

The memorial concludes with the observation that nothing can change the character of German "Kultur" in the Upper Adige.

New Coptic Manuscript Of St. John's Gospel

While the world was entertained last Winter by the discoveries near Thebes showing life in Egypt during the reign of Tut-ankh-Amen, a papyrus manuscript was unearthed at Qau-el-Kebir by the British School of Archaeology in Egypt. It is a Coptic translation of the Gospel of St. John, dating from the fourth century, and thus appears to lie between the two earliest Greek codices, the Vatican and the Sinaitic. It is now being exhibited for the first time at University College, London.

The MS. was found doubled up and wrapped in linen cloth. The leaves, of which there originally were about a hundred, have been straightened out by moistening with damp cotton wool, and many of them are in excellent condition. It is conjectured that this was a service book, buried for safety at the time of the Mohammedan invasion.

So far the book has not been entirely deciphered, but it is plain that it differs in several ways from the orthodox text and will be authoritative in so far as it will show what was the text of the Gospel as accepted by the early Copts, who, both chantedly and in language, are supposed to be the descendants of the Egyptians of the hieroglyphic age.

Other exhibits at the Museum, discovered at the same time as the Coptic MS., are an iron dagger assigned to the fortieth century B. C., which is considered the oldest iron implement in existence; the contents of an ivory workman's shop dating from the Nineteenth Dynasty, and the portions of three human skulls, one of full size and two of pigmy size, to which the provisional date of 30,000 B. C. has been assigned by Professor Sir W. M. Flinders Petrie.

Ludendorff Wins Suit Against German Editor

ERICH LUDENDORFF, one time Quartermaster General of the Kaiser's armies, won a victory in the Munich Court recently when Dr. Wiener, editor of the official gan of the Central Association of German Citizens of Jewish faith, was sentenced to pay a fine of 150,000 marks (about 75 cents), and the costs of the trial, and publish the verdict in his paper.

General Ludendorff sued Dr. Wiener for libel because the latter wrote and published an article based on an alleged interview with Ludendorff printed several months ago in a New York paper, but republished by the General, in which he was quoted as saying some hard things about the republican Government of Germany and German-Americans. Dr. Wiener wanted to know if the Law for the Defense of the Republic was not strong enough to punish the man who held it consistent with German honor to throw mud at the German Government in return for American dollars.

In testifying, Ludendorff said that he never had taken a dollar for an interview and "I never give out an interview without first reading it over."

CROSS LIBYAN DESERT; 2,000 MILES OF DANGERS

Waste Which Lies to the West of Egypt, Long a Land of Mystery, at Last Subdued.

READERS of Rosita Forbes's book, "The Secret of the Sahara-Kufara," will remember a certain Hassanein Bey, who accompanied her on a journey from Bengasi to Kufara, and whose "tact and eloquence so often saved the situation when my Arabic failed." Of Egyptian birth and European education, Secretary to the mission sent to the Senussi to prevent them from joining the Turks in the World War, Hassanein Bey last January started on a tour of exploration on his own account. It was to penetrate the hitherto impenetrable sands of the Egyptian Libyan desert by a path never yet taken by a white man who survived to tell of his adventures.

He started not only with the approval of the Egyptian Government, which for reasons of its own wished to establish communication with the nomad tribes on the frontier of the western hinterland and the Italian Libya, but also with its financial aid. It has taken him six months to cover the 2,000 miles. Only a hint of the difficulties overcome and the hardships endured are given by him in a modest account of his achievement which was received in London on June 16, having been telegraphed the same day from El Fasher, at his journey's end. It reads in part:

"I started from Sollum by car on Jan. 4. Thirty-five miles south I joined my caravan and reached Siwa after eight days' trek. From Siwa I went to Jaghbub (Jarabub), the holy place of the Senussi.

"Here I was delayed thirty-four days by the scarcity of camels and by the fear the other tribes had of the Ouyyas. Thence eleven days of sandstorms with moonlight nights took me to Jalo, where I chose the men who were to accompany me to the Sudan.

"I proceeded to Buttafal and on, over nine days of a bare expanse of sand to Zaghen Wells. From there I reached Hawari after four days' trek across sand dunes and Oenee to Kufara (Kufra), where I arrived on April 2.

"Instead of going to the Sudan by the trade route through Wadai as I had intended, I started after a fortnight's preparation by an unfrequented route for the Mrdi Hills, which I reached on May 12, after nineteen days' trekking, passing by the uncharted oases of Arkenu and Owenat.

"At Erdebah the difficult part of our journey was over. We had reached inhabited country. From here on we passed through country inhabited by Gorana and Bideas tribes, finding water on an average every fourth day."

LEGEND OF BEATRICE CENCI DISPROVED BY NEW FACTS

Old Documents Said to Show Woman Who Inspired Poets Was Not a Heroine—Conspired With Lover to End Father's Life and Lost Her Own.

CORRADO RICCI, who, from 1906 to 1919, was Director General of the Fine Arts of Italy and is now President of the National Institute of Archaeology and Fine Arts, has dissipated the Beatrice Cenci legend, which already had been punctured by the Jesuit Fathers Faria and Rinieri and Bertolotti in his "Francesco Cenci e la sua famiglia."

There probably has been no more mournfully appealing heroine in history than Beatrice Cenci, whose features were preserved in thousands of copies of "The Beautiful Parricide," a portrait attributed to Guido Reni, that has hung for three centuries or so in the Barberini Palace, Rome. The legend of how she and others slew her father, the wicked Francesco Cenci, and her particular reasons for so doing, were first given to the world with an elaborate biographical setting two centuries ago by Muratori in his "Annali d'Italia." Since then anti-Papal sentiment against the man, Pope Clement VIII., who ordered her decapitation, and the organization which he established and which endured down to 1870, has made her legend universal. Shelley's drama "The Cenci" is only one of the hundreds of plays, poems and stories which have perpetuated it.

Paria and Rinieri were more bent on whitewashing the reputation of Clement VIII. than they were on delving into the character of the defendant. They proved easily enough that she had confessed her crime and that the Pope had merely confirmed the finding of the court.

The first serious blow to the story was delivered by Bertolotti, who showed that Beatrice was not 17 years of age, but 24; that she was far from beautiful; that she was not the subject of the Barberini portrait, and that the portrait itself was not the work of Guido Reni.

There still remained, however, her defense at the trial—that she and her accomplices had slain her father because he had outraged her. Signor Ricci now undertakes to destroy even what history has long regarded as "justifiable parricide." For years he has been examining the archives of the Cenci family at Naples and those in the Vatican covering the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, and although his researches do not seem to have changed the legendary evil character of her father, they explain the Papal sentence on new ground, and make out Beatrice, if not a congenital criminal, at least a victim of a criminal environment.

It seems that her famous defense was merely a desperate expedient resorted to by her counsel, Farinaccio, when he saw that the case was going against his clients. It was known to be untrue at the time, but its introduction made such a bad impression on the Judges and the Pope that the former quickly sentenced her and the latter, in disgust, confirmed the sentence.

The documents examined by Professor Ricci also were said to have made it clear that Beatrice had been living for some time with an elderly man-at-arms of the Colonna family, named Olimpio Calvetti, who was responsible for actually carrying out the murder of Francesco Cenci, and was then slain by the Cenci themselves as one possessing evidence which might lead to their conviction.

There is a codicil to Beatrice's will, dated Sept. 8, 1599, which provides that a certain Caterina de Sanctis should use she yield of a prescribed sum "in sustenare un povero fanciullo pupillo, come il ho conferito a bocca" ("to maintain a poor orphan child, as I have explained to her by word of mouth"). This was her own child by Olimpio Calvetti, the actual murderer of her father, it is said.

Nor is there any doubt of the guilt of Beatrice's stepmother, Lucrezia, and of her own brothers, Giacomo and Bernardo, of plotting Francesco's death, which was actually carried out by Beatrice's lover, aided by some hirelings.

Baldwin Americanized.

BRITAIN'S Prime Minister, Stanley Baldwin, has been much influenced in his habits by his visit to the United States. He has always been an inveterate pipe smoker, and used to alternate his smokes with Turkish cigarettes; but since returning from America he has shown preference for Virginia sweet tobacco. He does not appear to have been too favorably impressed by our "cereals," but recently said: "I invariably begin breakfast with grapefruit, which is as refreshing as a cold bath."

Little Entente Confers On Bulgarian Attitude

IN spite of the reassuring messages sent out by the new Government of Bulgaria, the members of the Little Entente—Yugoslavia, Rumania and Czechoslovakia—have deemed the situation produced by the ousting of the Stambulisky régime in Bulgaria as sufficiently serious to warrant a conference of their Foreign Ministers.

In this Yugoslavia took the initiative and summoned the Ministers to meet on July 15 at Sinaia, the Rumanian Summer resort. It is known that the Belgrade Government is far from satisfied with the protestations made by the successors of Stambulisky's Government, and would like to have the Little Entente formulate a plan of action in case the interpretation of the Treaty of Neuilly, as followed by the former Bulgar Administration, is not strictly adhered to by the new Government. It also is understood that at Sinaia a formula will be discussed by which the Little Entente will petition for representation in the Council of the League of Nations.

SPARTA EXCAVATIONS ALTER ACCEPTED IDEAS

Military Period Began in Sixth Century B. C. Instead of Earlier Time.

THE British School at Athens, which was obliged to suspend excavations in Sparta during the World War, is preparing to resume them under the direction of Professor R. C. Bosanquet and Professor R. M. Dawkins. The most important discoveries so far have been the temples of Artemis and Orthia and Athena Chalkioikos, together with pieces of sculpture—marble, terracotta, ivory—and inscriptions, which have served to fix disputed dates and confirm various events in Spartan history.

Thus the earliest settlement, called Menelaion, because Menelaus was venerated there, was fixed on the left bank of the Eurotas. The date of the arrival of the Dorians at the beginning of the age of iron also was approximately determined. The Dorians founded the two temples mentioned, and the earliest Dorian stratum yielded a wealth of amber ornaments similar to that found at Hallstadt, proving that the Spartans came from the north. In the next stratum were unmistakable signs of foreign influence, such as the shellfish used by the Phoenicians in their dyes and brought by Ionian sailors to Sparta. To a stratum nearer the surface belong the relics of distinctive Spartan art. An ivory relief representing a galley setting out to sea was uncovered, supposed to portray the abduction of Helen by Paris.

From the inscriptions, written in a crude dialect, it was learned that the legend Lycurgus founded his famous system for personal and social conduct within two centuries of the settlement of the Dorians was a delusion, and that the great military period had its inception in the sixth century B. C. and not earlier. According to the deductions made by the Hellenic scholar, Professor Percy Gardner:

"It was only by degrees that the keen desire of military domination mastered the Spartans—but it did so finally to such an extent that poetry and art, and all the humanities of life, were banished; and the Spartan became a man of few words and no accomplishments, accustomed to the hardest of lives and the coarsest of food, only redeeming the harshness of his nature by the cultivation of certain virtues in which he excelled all mankind, and in regard to which he has given to all times a noble ideal. We still speak of Spartan courage, Spartan frugality and simplicity, Spartan self-devotion to the State."

Other scholars deduce from the relics that poetry and dancing were preserved throughout the military age both as an inspiration and as element of military exercise.

NEW RUSSIAN EXPEDITION

Two Women Will Accompany Party Which Is to Penetrate to the Mongolian Hinterland.

IN the deserts of Mongolia, far away from cities and civilization, a rumor originated some years ago of a dead city, abandoned by its inhabitants for centuries and buried ever more deeply beneath shifting sands. The rumor was difficult to verify. Few explorers penetrated into this wild and desolate country. Finally, in 1907, a Russian scientific expedition, led by Professor Koslov, set out with the purpose of searching for the city. The task was difficult because the nomadic tribes in the region were suspicious of strangers and slow to give information.

Koslov worked with tact and patience. He employed a Mongolian familiar with the native language to go about disguised as a merchant in an effort to get some hint of the city's location. But the Mongolian was suspected as an agent of the foreigners and for a long time could obtain no information. Finally he was compelled during a storm to camp near the city itself, without being aware of it. The natives regarded this as a sign of divine intervention and made no further difficulties about guiding him to the ruins. This was how the dead city of Kara-Khoto became known to the outside world.

When the Russian exploring party approached Kara-Khoto with their Mongolian guide they were compelled to plow through sand drifts fifteen feet deep. It was this sand, together with the arid climate of Mongolia, that had preserved the city's walls and monuments over a period of many centuries. The neighboring tribesmen, who had settled near the city ten generations before, declared that it always had been there as far back as their records reached.

The streets and houses of Kara-Khoto have been largely obliterated by waves of sand. But Koslov's party found many interesting memorials in this Mongolian Pompeii. There were the remains of Buddhist temples and Mohammedan mosques. There were packages of Chinese paper money, bearing grim inscriptions threatening counterfeiters with the loss of their heads. There were silver ornaments and money, carefully hidden away by the original owners.

The most important discovery of all was a cone-shaped monument outside the city walls. In this monument was a library of 2,000 books, written in seven Eastern languages. Several other things found in and about the city helped to piece out the legend about the fate of the tribe which formerly lived there. In the thirteenth or fourteenth century, so the legend ran, the Chinese had sent out an army to capture Kara-Khoto. For several years they besieged the city in vain. Then a Chinese engineer conceived the idea of cutting off the water supply. He blocked up with sandbags the river which formerly flowed through the city and turned its course in a different direction. The people, desperate with thirst, dug a deep well inside the walls, but failed to get enough water to sustain life. Then the population buried all its treasures. The chief of the tribe killed his wife and daughter with his own hand and ordered a mass sortie through a breach in the wall. The doomed tribe rushed out, only to be slaughtered in the open by the superior forces of the Chinese.

Traces Bear Out Legend.

This grim legend was borne out by discoveries of the explorers. They found that a nearby river had been artificially diverted from its channel. And the wall of the city had a large breach, through which the last desperate sortie might well have been made.

The Russians found in the monument many signs of high culture on the part of the former inhabitants. There were books in Persian, Arabic and Hindoo script, as well as volumes in Mongolian and Chinese. There was a collection of more than three hundred sacred Buddhist pictures, painted on backgrounds of cloth and silk. There were many statues of Buddhist gods and goddesses. Traces of former canals were found in the city.

After thoroughly exploring Kara-Khoto and its surroundings, Koslov buried the less portable treasures and set out to discover Kookoonor, a lake in the vicinity which it was said no white man had ever seen, although French and German explorers had tried to reach it. The nomads who lived about the lake made every effort to prevent the travelers from launching a boat on it. They declared that the waters of Kookoonor were under a mysterious spell, that every boat would be irresistibly drawn to the bottom.

Notwithstanding these warnings, some of the members of the party embarked. They were caught in a heavy storm the first night, and the natives were certain that the wrath of the gods had been aroused. But the boat weathered the storm safely; and a skyrocket announced the arrival of the party on the other side, to the relief of Koslov and the amazement of the Mongolians, who had never seen anything of the kind before.

On the other side of the lake the Russians found three Buddhist monks, wild men with shaggy, matted hair and beards that had never been shaved. They were in great fear at first sight of the strangers. Later two of them proved accessible, but the third remained obstinately savage, refusing to say a word.

Lake Kookoonor did not mark the end of the expedition's adventures. Penetrating into the mountains of northern Tibet, the party encountered a band of mounted robbers, who attacked them with swarms of arrows. These were no match for the firearms of the Russians and the robbers were beaten off.

The story of these explorations was recently told by Professor Koslov before a large and interested audience in the Moscow Polytechnical Institute. The lecture was illustrated with motion-picture slides; and a map of Mongolia, showing the location of the buried city and the route of the expedition, hung on a blackboard behind the speaker's stage. Koslov, an erect, soldierly figure, with deepset, piercing eyes, confined himself chiefly to the narrative of his past experiences, touching only briefly on the prospects of a new exploring expedition which he is planning to lead into Mongolia and Tibet. He spoke in more detail on the latter subject in a personal interview with the writer.

The new exploring party is to be made up of seventeen Russians and four Mongolians. Leaving Petrograd it will proceed by rail to Eastern Siberia. From there the route turns south, to Urga, the capital of Mongolia. The expedition is planned for three years. The first year will be spent in Mongolia, the second in Tibet, and the third will be devoted to the homeward journey, which may be through India or Chinese Turkestan.

Two Women on Trip.

"The purposes of the expedition," said Professor Koslov, "are purely scientific.

"One novel feature of this expedition is the fact that two women will be included in the party. My wife, who once rode through Mongolia on horseback and who knows how to handle a rifle, will accompany the expedition as an ethnographist and zoologist. She is acquainted with the Tibetan language and will study the customs of Tibetan and Mongolian women. The other woman in the party, a friend of my wife, is a doctor and natural scientist. She expects to collect butterflies and other insect specimens."

ANATOLE FRANCE SEES EUROPE ON EVE OF WAR

Letter Read at Jaures Memorial Is Widely Quoted by the German Press.

AT the recent dedication of a monument in Carmaux, the native town of Jean Jaurès, the French Socialist leader, who was murdered by a nationalist fanatic on the eve of the World War, a letter from Anatole France was read to the 10,000 persons present by Albert Thomas, Director of the International Labor Office of the League of Nations. This letter has been widely quoted in the German press and, as given, reads as follows:

"Just as in 1914, we are standing today on the verge of war. All the powers ruling France recognise and declare this. Formerly they told us, when they demanded human butchery without any reason, that this would be the last war. Today they tell us: 'Prepare for war. We shall have it in twenty years, in ten years, perhaps even sooner. Perhaps we shall have it right away if we evacuate the Ruhr, which is to supply the Germans with munitions.'

"I don't know anything about that. I dare not say that it is impossible. But who is responsible? Hasn't our policy done everything to bring about and hasten the coming of this war of which we are being warned? We have not established peace. I have told you already that the bourgeoisie does not desire to bring about peace, nor can or will it do so."

"The war is not ended. You surely see that we have been at war since the armistice. What act could be stronger or more definitely hostile than the occupation of the Ruhr! With a display of spirit and sagacity, they try to prove to us that this act is necessary in order for us to obtain our demands. But don't you believe that a decisive and peace-loving act would have got nearer the goal and that the resumption of commercial relations with a bordering State that is stronger in population, industry and trade would have given us more guarantees for our enrichment than a demand backed up with the armed hand that so far has cost us a great deal?

"How do our people stand there, and in what an unworthy state of drowsiness have they sunk? Have we got so far that we have lost all feeling of self-assertion and that we let everything be attended to by a Parliament that is leading us toward destruction, and this not so much through brilliant mistakes and foolishness of genius as through the impulse of ignorance and stupidity? Shall we leave our fate to this Parliament?

"Citizens, remember the voice of Jaurès. Five years before the war this great man said: 'I have faith in the possibility of an European peace congress. I have faith in the possibility of a rapprochement between France, England and Germany.

"Jaurès, today, I do not want to admire you in the magnificent immortality of bronze and marble. You would be too far from us that way. I want to see you as I knew you alive. In this critical moment, filled with more fearful terrors than our thoughtfulness grasps, we need precepts from the fountain of your wisdom. We ask you, our master and friend, you best of all men: Admonish us and give us your advice!

"Listen, citizens, to the man you have come here to honor and whose vision was never wrong. We have never found ourselves in a more menacing and tragic position than this one which has been brought about by the shortsightedness and mistakes of our present leaders."

Red Army Plot Reported To Revolt Against Soviet

ACCORDING to the Berlin Rul, three officers of the Red Army were recently arrested by the Russian State Political Administration when they were about to cross the Lithuanian frontier. From an authoritative source the paper learns that the arrested officers were representatives of army units stationed in Moscow and Petrograd who were sent secretly to Paris in order to inform one of the members of the Romanoff family that these units were ready to march against the Soviets. It is also asserted that the arrest of the officers enabled the State Political Administration to disclose a well-knitted monarchist plot in the Red Army. The plotters are said to have their representatives and adherents all over the country, mostly among the Red soldiers and officers. The organization is in touch with one of the directing centres of the Russian émigrés in Europe.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

HOPE OF FUTURE PEACE

John Bates Clark Contends League Has Proved Its Efficiency and Offers Best Chance of Success.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It will take statesmanship to plan in detail the best course of action for preserving the peace of the world. It takes common sense only to see what the fundamental traits of such a plan must be. Any one can outline it in a charcoal sketch, for only two general plans are possible and one of them has been followed from the origin of human life until the present day, while the other has never been tried over any wide territory.

Evolution means war between animal species and survival means victory in this warfare. Man now dominates his planet because his remote ancestors were the fittest to win in such a struggle. Their social quality enabled them to mass their forces for battle, and the weapons they made were an offset to the teeth and claws of the fiercer tenants of the jungle. Their "arboreal habits" were a rude substitute for the walls behind which their descendants later found shelter.

No general peace ever existed in the animal kingdom and none has ever been realized by the human species except within limited periods and areas. Within tribes it has regularly existed, but between them it has been only intermittent. The growth of the power of a tribe has meant the extension of an area of peace in the general world melée and, later, conquest and empire building furnished the only means of shielding large and populous areas from the chronic strife of early times. The process was a small way, in a small forest, but we hear of it as developed on arable plains about the Tigris, Euphrates, Nile and Ganges. The four mysterious rivers of Eden are not spoken of as draining areas but as watering them, and very far advanced was civilization when such irrigation became a chief means of developing power and wealth.

The recorded history of the life of man covers a scanty one-hundredth part of its probable duration, and it does not trace the fortunes of our race back to any condition of universal barbarism. War, first with claw and fang, then with rude weapons and organization, fill the long period before the records begin, and the civilization did not stop it. What it did was to circumscribe certain areas of internal peace. These areas were strictly limited and without were formless barbarism and unending war.

We have inherited from the jungle what we may perhaps call a "tolerance" of warfare--something that is in the blood and that banishes reason whenever there is a call to arms. For ages this was necessary for survival, but at present it threatens to preclude survival on any satisfactory scale unless there is something better in the blood that is capable of counteracting it. On and beyond the borders of empires war has continued, but the condition within the borders has been of the kind that gets its name from the last empire of antiquity--pax Romana, the peace that Rome gave to the lands that it ruled.

The recent war originated in a latter-day effort to accomplish something of this kind, and for a long time it seemed to promise success. For a while Belgium was spoken of by its conquerors as "our new province." There was an effort to placate England and detach France from her Allies by annexing only colonies belonging to that power, but, after the rejection of the offer, much French territory was planned for permanent seizure and a vast area extending toward the south and the east was marked for German control. If such an empire had been created, there would have been a pax Germanica within its confines resembling that of pax Romana.

The defeat of the plan brought another type of peace within sight and reach, namely, a peace by concurrent action of free and independent States. Aside from the old peace by conquest this is the only attainable kind. A prize of the largest size might safely be offered for any other type of peace having a promise of success, for there would be no winners. For a peace by united action of sovereign States there is the strongest ground for hope.

As Aristotle said, "Man is by nature a political being." His combining and co-operating tendency has given him dominion over the world, and it has also enabled him to keep order within the several parts of his dominion. Civil order is won because the interests of all citizens require that life and property be made safe. Between States the great war has multiplied the incentives to further war.

Exhaustion of resources, human and material, is now affording a golden interval within which the perils of the future may be faced and averted. It is a safe proposition that the one only workable plan for doing this is by enlisting sovereign States in combined action that, while fully preserving their sovereignty, unites them in repressing powers that may be disposed to play the brigand.

Motives for resorting to this expedient would be ample if warfare now signified only the kind of struggle that we are familiar with before 1914; but war in its new type is a thing hitherto unknown. It means near-annihilation for the contestants. If the war that now seems to hover in the near distance actually occurs it will begin with the art of organized murder advanced far beyond the perfection it had attained when the recent war ended. It will be a struggle in which every soldier in the ranks will feel as if he were under a death sentence only briefly suspended. A mother, today, if she looks upon her little boy and thinks of another world war as coming must regard him as perhaps under a like sentence longer suspended. A mere closing of the eyes to the future, a blind trust that something unknown may avert the annihilating process, satisfies no one. The danger is real, and if there is that in human nature which gives a very comforting chance that it may be averted, it is that which has prepared the way for combining for that purpose.

The associating tendency in humanity is far stronger than it has ever been before, and the fighting impulse is distinctly weaker. The deeply rooted horror of another war goes far toward driving us to the course that will save us from it, but with this motive we have acquired an increased aptitude for the required action. Automatically the world has become one great economic organism and that fact has reacted on the entire life of man.

It has been said that the clock strikes the hours, but that no homage of time tells when we are passing from era to era. I claim that the guns which turned the tide of battle against the all but triumphant German army made exactly that announcement. They marked the close of the era in which peace was attainable only by empire building and only within the area of established empires. We have entered upon an era when peace is surely possible by a concerted action of independent powers. If so--and this statement is not universal or wholly uninterrupted, since local and transient lapses into barbarism will be possible, but a means is within reach for preventing general war.

There is good hope for averting that, if men will look for it, and this is particularly probable if Americans will have it so. Peace is an indispensable part of any good future for the race, and it cannot possibly come in any other way than by an association of States for securing it. Actually to accept as predestined the ruin that another world war would work would mean the uprooting of one of the deepest beliefs of human nature. In favor of the belief that the League of Nations may be made the precursor of a general peace there are a goodly number of important facts:

1. Evolution has powerfully reinforced the combining tendency that in the remote past enabled the human race to survive.

2. It has weakened the fighting instinct.

3. It has put economic activities in a position of supremacy in practical life.

4. It has reduced the barriers which once interfered with worldwide economic organization. Commerce, finance, migration, interchange of practical method and scientific thought pay small attention to political boundaries.

5. The initial steps in uniting nations for the suppression of warfare--necessarily the hardest--have been, by a seeming "miraculous turn of events, actually taken.

6. The League has proved its efficiency in the brief period since its organization. It would surprise Americans to read in detail the list of its successful activities. It has a far better chance of success and permanence than any new organization which might be substituted for it. The manner in which America may best co-operate is a question involving details which do not belong among the certainties of the subject. In the absence of political fogs, often as baffling in one field as the fogs on the Atlantic are in another, the country that led the way to democracy will see its duty and do it.

THE DAY FOR IMMIGRANTS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

May I, as President of the League of Foreign-Born Citizens, commend most earnestly your editorial, "A Day for Immigrants"? The spirit of your well-considered message is one of appreciation of the contribution of the newcomers to American life, and of the obligation which rests upon the citizens of native birth to welcome, with continuing warmth and friendliness, those recently arrived at our shores.

The League of Foreign-Born Citizens two years ago promulgated a program of consecration of Independence Day to the new citizens--native born and newly naturalized. The plan received the official sanction of the National American Council, at its recent annual meeting in Washington, which was presided over by Frank A. Vanderlip, its President, and was addressed by President Harding. The program of the league as announced, was, in part as follows:

> Independence Day, each year, should mark a rededication of America, by native and foreign born together, to the ideals and to the principles of the founders of the nation.
> A Fourth of July program should be an impressive and dignified ceremony that will properly evidence the importance of the advent of these new recruits into our citizenry and recognize the united forces of the native and foreign-born people that make up the Republic of the West.
>
> Every city and town--wherever it is possible to do so--an assemblage should plan a public meeting, a civic court of honor. In conjunction with the public meetings there should be a parade or pageant, in which at times conceptions of the cultural contribution of the foreign-born citizens there should be floats or tableaux depicting their historical and artistic background. The pageant should include scenes depicting in panorama the magic story of our own country--the eras of discovery, exploration, colonization, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the birth of the American flag, the winning of the West, freedom of the slaves--industrial growth of the nation--America and the World War.
>
> The Boy Scouts in every community, upon receiving the names and addresses of all those who are foreign-born and will exercise the right of citizenship for the first time at the election following, as well as the names and addresses of the foreign born who have been naturalized during the current year, will undoubtedly give to them by inviting personally new citizens and new voters to be the guests of the community at the meeting.
>
> The meeting should be addressed by leading citizens and public officials. There should also be an address by a new prospective voter and by a new citizen. The addresses by the public officials and by the distinguished speakers should stress the meaning of America and the part it has played in the development of the ideal of Government based upon the consent of the governed, that these speeches should also be directed to certain practical ends.
>
> (a) To hasten the speaking of English for the development of a common language for the proper performance of their duties as citizens; for the taking of proper advantage of industrial opportunity and greater safety through the avoidance of industrial accidents.
>
> (b) To encourage the reading of American newspapers. The foreign language press has been a powerful force in America's assimilation, but it should be encouraged to read an American newspaper written in the language of his adopted country.
>
> (c) To encourage the native-born men and women to show real respect and friendship and neighborliness to the foreign-born dweller in their midst and to publicly ask for the cessation of the use of offensive nicknames which are often applied to foreigners.
>
> Small American flags should be distributed to the audiences and each should pledge allegiance to the flag. The native-born and foreign-born citizens should each receive an appropriate button or other insignia to keep as a memento. Governor of each State and the Mayor of each city should issue an appropriate proclamation. All public buildings, churches, synagogues and other places of worship should be decked with the nation's colors. Flags should be displayed from homes and store windows.

Your espousal of the dedication of the Fourth of July to the celebration of citizenship is heartening to all who have sought to make more significant the circumstances that surround the granting of citizenship.

The courtroom, dark, depressing, 300 or 400 men and women crowded, chiefly standing in quarters that can scarcely fitly seat 100; the Judge, unable with dignity to cope with the herculean task, drones out the name of the would-be-citizen, asks an occasional perfunctory question--and the alien has become a citizen.

There should be more Judges assigned to the naturalization parts and more days set aside for naturalization. I have suggested a number of methods whereby the crowding could be avoided--having witnesses appear before the Naturalization Examiner, but their affidavits sufficient for the Court--but so long as the procedure remains unchanged, the courtrooms should be more commodious and fewer applicants should be assigned for examination on a given day.

The actual citizenship certificates should be ready, so that the new citizen should take to his home the diploma which would signify his graduation from old world allegiance and the commencement of his abiding fealty to the land of his adoption. The motto of the league to teach the foreign-born that America is the land of opportunity and of reciprocal obligations. The Judge should deliver an address that would inspire the new citizens to a full realization of the meaning of their American citizenship and of the obligation which it entails to learn to speak and think in the American language, to join a political party, to read the newspapers, to inform themselves about political questions and candidates, to vote at primaries and at elections; to become "participating citizens."

NORTHFIELD SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

For forty years the Northfield Schools have sought to provide an open door of opportunity to young people of earnest purpose but limited financial resources. Until the war the annual charge for board and tuition was $100, and this payment was supplemented by each student meeting a required duty in connection with the work of the school. This moderate charge necessitated raising an equal sum per student through general appeals.

With the extraordinary increase in cost during the last ten years, it has been necessary to increase the charges to students to a point beyond which we do not dare to go, lest the very purpose of the school, of helping those of limited means, shall be thwarted. With an aggregate enrollment of approximately 1,300 students in Northfield Seminary for girls and Mount Hermon School for boys, we have to raise $120,000. This amount is gathered by contributed in moderate sums. Last year $117,683 was contributed, and of this $17,680 was contributed by former students.

The fiscal year closes July 31, and during the next thirty days we are seeking to raise $20,000 to fully meet the requirements of the work. As you have generously given space in your paper to make known the needs of Northfield in the past, I am writing to again seek your co-operation at this time of special need.

Any contributions may be sent directly to the Treasurer of the Northfield Schools, Edwin M. Bulkley, 25 Broad Street, New York City, or to Motor License Congestion.

In reading in the Sunday TIMES of the congestion in the Highway Department of New York, due to the removal of driving licenses for motorists, I am surprised to learn that licenses are all issued to expire July 1. In Massachusetts licenses are issued for one year from the date of the day they are granted; in this way renewals are being handled every day during the year, and so there is no congestion on any one day. Renewal blanks are sent to all operators a month before the license expires, giving plenty of time for the operator to receive his new one for the ensuing year. • • •

Mob Rule in the West.

Almost on the day that telegraphic reports carried news of the acquittal of George Barkwell, accused as a member of the mob that lynched James T. Scott, colored janitor of the University of Missouri, last April 29, come clippings from The Kansas City Star expressing doubt, as to whether the guilty man was lynched. In fact, another man is being held in jail charged with the crime for which Scott was publicly and brutally murdered. The hopelessness of obtaining justice in that part of the country may be judged from the fact that only thirty-four out of the eighty-three men could be accepted on the panel for the jury to try the case. Three of the first talesmen to be examined did not believe the case against the alleged murderer should be prosecuted and two talesmen were frankly in favor of mob violence on certain occasions--all this in the case of a man, probably innocent, mutilated, with a good record, who had been murdered in the presence of a crowd partly composed of young people of both sexes.

Rents in New York.

• • • In an article July 17 Stewart Browne is quoted as saying: "How it can be claimed that there is an emergency in housing when there are thousands of vacant apartments on the upper west side, Washington Heights, Bronx, Kings and Queens I cannot understand. They may be at rents that the tenants do not want to pay but can well afford to pay." Will you permit me to ask Mr. Browne how a family of two adults, one a wage earner with an annual salary of $2,500, can afford to pay the rents asked for three or four room apartments, which he says "the tenants can well afford to pay"? From the viewpoint of health and sanitation I do not approve of families "doubling up," and I can understand a landlord not wishing to rent his apartments to people who take in roomers, but on the other hand I can sympathize with the families of very limited incomes who cannot afford to pay the rents asked for apartments in New York City, and there are many such families. • • •

Discrimination on Ferries.

May I suggest that the proper authorities in New York take some action on this side of the river in favor of our automobilists, to counteract the discrimination practiced against the average motorist unfortunate enough to visit New Jersey who is compelled to use the Weehawken ferry upon returning? The discrimination takes the form of special passes which are issued by the Mayor of Weehawken and by H. J. O'Shaughnessy Stearns, Chairman of Roads, Township of Weehawken, to certain New Jersey automobilists, permitting them to pass from the top of the Palisades direct to the ferry, to the exclusion of other motorists, who are compelled to stay in line and await their turn after the favored ones have preceded them on the ferries. This morning, for instance, it required more than 1 hour and 30 minutes for me to drive my car from the top of the Palisades to the ferry house in Weehawken. I had to remain in line with several hundred cars, moving at a snail's pace, and I counted exactly 123 automobiles, all with New Jersey licenses, which passed at full speed down the hill and by the traffic policeman, while all those without passes were compelled to remain in line. • • •

Damage by Lightning.

• • • During the past year lightning destroyed no less than thirty million dollars' worth of property in the United States, something more than 5 per cent. of the total fire loss. Perhaps 10 per cent. of this destruction was due to the lack of lightning-rods, or to the use of rods which were improperly installed. There has been a curious reaction from the old idea of the infallible lightning-rod which has resulted in wholly inadequate protection or none at all. A properly installed lightning-rod will almost invariably protect the building upon which it is placed and it is highly desirable that the public should become familiar with this fact and with proper means of selecting adequate systems of lightning protection. Underwriters' Laboratories, a non-commercial organization existing for the inspection and testing of fire prevention devices, established on Jan. 1 of the current year, permits instant identification of correct lightning-rod installations without cost to the user. • • •

Porto Ricans and Taxes.

In your issue of July 15 I came across a protest by a Porto Rican on the question of income tax clearance to which Porto Ricans with aliens are subjected on leaving the United States. I am inclined to believe that the authorities are quite justified in their demand and it is all the fault of the Porto Rican immigration authorities and the steamship agents at Porto Rico. A very large number of aliens from South America go to Porto Rico and from there come to the United States claiming to be Porto Ricans. • • •

A Chance for Women Voters.

The country needs domestic labor,—cooks, houseworkers, laundresses, gardeners and farm workers. There are plenty of these on the other side eager to come here. Let the new law be so framed as to produce a flood of these and thus maintain the American home which is steadily passing away. Such legislation will be welcomed by every one. Even our lords and masters, organized labor, can raise no objection to it. • • •

Social Scandals in the Press.

May I presume to find fault with the newspapers of the present day, especially with the Sunday issue of some of the great city dailies? Every day and every week there is something sensational, scandalous and outrageous published about the homes and lives of citizens in some part of the country, showing in detail in language and by photographs the most unfortunate, the most unhappy and the most demoralising features of domestic life. Irresponsible correspondents are paid by mercenary papers to uncover and expose to public view the frailities, the faults and the failures of domestic life to satisfy the curiosity and the worst passions of human life. The free press is a mighty power for good, but when it creates an eager thirst to see and read about social scandals it becomes a great power to demoralize mankind and to make life a failure. • • • Far, indeed, have we wandered from the day and the time Noah's sons walked backward, carrying a garment on their arms to cover the drunken nakedness of the old man. Susquehanna Power Project.

In your issue of July 16 you mention the total estimated cost of the Susquehanna hydroelectric development project, $30,000,000, but you neglected to give the estimated electric horse power expected. This is a very vital point. Should the estimate be 200,000 horse power, the gross returns at a yearly rental of $20 would be $4,000,000. To offset this, interest at 6 per cent. on the capital invested would be $1,800,000. Adding to this 3 per cent. for depreciation, overhead charges and cost of distribution within 100 miles of the generating point would bring the total annual charges up to $2,700,000. • • • On the other hand, to generate 200,000 horse power by steam, with coal at $5 a ton, would, not including interest, overhead and depreciation, cost not less than $8,000,000, the plant working continuously twenty-four hours a day. • • •

Where Carmencita Danced.

Your correspondent, Mr. Taggart, is correct as to Carmencita dancing at Koster & Bial's, but I think he errs regarding its former occupancy, confounding it with the old Eden Musée further west, which was occupied by Christie's Minstrels some time before. Carmencita first appeared at Niblo's Garden in a Bolossy Kiraly production called Antiope," on Aug. 17, 1889, and "was a la frost" because the Spanish dancing was new in those days. • • •

Suggests Dry Law Reform.

The Utopia, which the Prohibitionists led us to believe would be a natural result of the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment, has not, after more than three years of so-called aridity, arrived. I venture to say that since the beginning of time till the advent of Mr. Volstead act there has not been so much talk about liquor as there has been since an iniquitous law went into effect. Where we once were counseled to pity the poor drunkards we are now asked by Mr. Roy Haynes (who must be utterly devoid of a sense of humor) to pity the poor enforcement officers who are almost driven insane by offers of fantastic bribes. The average taxpaying citizen finds it difficult to work himself into a frenzy over this unfavorable state of affairs. Does it never occur to any one in high places that if the Volstead act has bred such corruption it is time to think of changing it?

What Would They Think?

I wonder what the old-time prohibitionists, such as Hon. John P. St. John, Hon. John B. Finch, Clinton B. Fisk, Neal Dow, Miss Frances Willard, Rev. C. H. Mead and others would think of the present prohibition amendment and the present enforcement by the Republican Administration under President Harding? Would they not think the enforcement a joke, as it was in Maine and Vermont in the days when they were forever creating public sentiment in favor of submitting the question of prohibition to the electorate and voting into power a Prohibition Administration as absolutely essential to enforce such a law. • • • J. The Ironclad Lease.

The new "iron-clad" lease adopted by the United Real Estate Owners' Association brings forcibly to mind the unfair and unnatural situation that prevails in New York City today relative to the renting of property for housing purposes. Although prices of commodities have increased since the war and traction companies have been held down to prewar fares, the landlords have made the sky the limit in their rent charges. This is in spite of the fact that the builders of new apartment houses have been granted an exemption from city taxes for ten years. A speculator told me a short time ago that he long since had given up Wall Street as a place for speculation. He said that didn't compare with real estate for speculative purposes. He said he knew of apartment buildings that changed hands a dozen times in a month, each time for a higher price, and he didn't know where it would end. The speculators did not stop to get abstracts of record the deeds. Each new owner raises the rents and what do the authorities do? They make a big fuss about the traction companies and about Wall Street, but they do not step in and put a stop to raising of rents and say "Stop!" Citizens can stay away from Wall Street and they can walk, if they don't have the price of a ride, but they cannot live without roofs over their heads.

FOR A CLEANER CITY.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The attention which THE TIMES is paying to the question of maintaining the parks of the city free from litter and refuse prompts us to write you in further development of the subject as it relates to the city as a whole.

The Clean City League is a citizens' organization to promote cleanliness of streets and public places in the City of New York. Many organizations are doing work along a similar line, but with them it is only a side issue—being merely one of many things in which they are interested. The organizers of the Clean City League believe that an organization that stands for that one object is absolutely necessary to do lasting and effective work. It aims to be helpful to the police, to the press, of every organization in educating the millions of this great city in the spirit of cleanliness and civic pride.

The unnecessary and quite appalling prevalence of the spitting habit and the littering throughout not only unsightly but meaning expense, disease and fire peril, is not vicious but thoughtless.

The Clean City League is not an "anti" society, but an affirmative movement. Kicking is one of the most baneful forms of mental calisthenics. It at least shows that the citizens are alive and take an active interest in the welfare of their city.

The Clean City League is anti nothing but dirt, disease and waste of health and public funds. Our aim is not an impossible one, for we are not fighting an appetite. Only striving for what every citizen really wants—clean streets and public places, good manners, civic pride, safety from disease and fire, &c. We have only to create public sentiment so strong that the individual offender will recognize his thoughtlessness and responsibility. Very few know the law, or that they are violating it.

That the evil is not at all incorrigible as a high official says it is, we think is proved by this incident. The small park about the old City College, Twenty-third Street and Lexington Avenue, was so neglected for years that it was made a dumping ground for newspapers, boxes, wrappings and debris by the crowds who passed it daily. At the request of citizens it was transformed, shrubs planted and the lawn encouraged to grow. The surprising and hopeful thing was that the passing thousands automatically stopped throwing things over the high fence. They saw it cared for and respected it.

The Knight of the Woeful Countenance, as Punch dubbed Henry Bergh, was backed and was successful with his Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. How much more have we a right to expect co-operation in the education and welfare of five or six millions of human beings who cannot be invented off the streets of our great city.

BONDAGE IN THE STEERAGE

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Recent criticism of Ellis Island suggests to my mind the query: Why confine attention to this particular spot and the alleged wrongs of aliens when the incoming vessels themselves are turned into veritable high class prison ships in so far as third class passengers, both homecoming American citizens and aliens, are concerned? This is done in the name of the American Immigration and Public Health authorities, and regulations are undiscriminatingly enforced that subject passengers to insult and humiliation from the time they leave the dock on the other side till they land here.

My own recent experience as a third class passenger from Liverpool to New York is still fresh in my mind. As a result, I feel it no less than a duty to make the public acquainted, in so far as I am able to do so, with these high handed and Prussianistic proceedings. It is high time that this insulting and stripping of decent and cleanly native born American men and women, or, for that matter, of naturalized citizens and aliens, of a like character, be stopped.

I find not one fault with useful and necessary regulations looking to the public good, even when they cause me considerable personal inconvenience. I was myself for several years the health officer of a New England town and I recognize the value of such regulations. But there are ways of doing things and other ways, and the methods used in this instance are as useless and unnecessary as they are abominable and outrageous.

It is not fair to presume meanly because a person is unable to afford the price of a first or second cabin passage that he is not only filthy but immoral and devoid of all finer feelings and sensibility. Yet this is precisely the assumption on which the American Health and Immigration authorities act in their dealings with third class passengers, native or alien. It is an undeniable fact that perfectly decent and scrupulously cleanly persons are sometimes forced to herd in this manner. In our own company we numbered an ex-sea captain, a doctor and his wife, a former trained nurse, a member of the Boston Police Department and numerous others for whom these regulations were superfluous and insulting. The third chief steward informed me that he had carried people from all walks of life. A glaring instance of the incongruity of the indiscriminate application of such methods was my own newly made wife, a woman of education and refinement and whose habits of personal cleanliness certainly leave nothing to be desired.

We were limited as to means and both of us were anxious to see Europe. We had supposed we were to have second class, having been warned of the possibility of humiliation at the hands of the American health authorities. The first-class purser, with whom I had some dealings going to prove that the third-class was all right for a man, had advised me against traveling into America in that class with a lady. Nevertheless, we allowed ourselves to be talked into doing so by another purser, who assured us some discrimination would be shown. Then, too, the uniform courtesy and consideration shown us on the trip over, traveling into England third-class, misled us. Anyhow, we made the mistake and suffered the consequences, for any other consideration for the finer sensibilities. The impression given is that lack of money, even temporarily, comes very near to being a crime in the eyes of the American authorities.

A. C.

New York City, July 16, 1923.

However, in our case, was very superficial. As we walked on the boat we passed in line before a man who told us to hold out our hands and who looked into our hair for possible vermin. This just after passing the medical inspection on the dock. On the first day of the trip the sense of prison-like regulations was increased by a steward who came on deck and peremptorily ordered all women and children below for an enforced bath. To be sure, in certain instances, the women were merely given tickets and told to bathe at their own discretion, but the humiliation of going so ordered about was there.

At 9 o'clock, daylight saving time, 8 o'clock Eastern standard time, every night all women, married or unmarried, whether with their husbands or not, were ordered off the decks. The men could stay as long as they liked. A regulation as silly as it was odious and insulting, since it substitutes the comparative seclusion of below decks for the openness of the well-lighted and, at least, should be, well-patrolled decks. This constitutes not only an affront to American womanhood but a direct sin against the laws of health.

About half way over we were subjected to a medical inspection by the ship's doctors. The men were got together in a dining room on one side of the ship and the women and children in a corresponding dining room on the other. A huge electric light was installed for the purpose. The women were forced to take down their hair and loosen their clothing. They then passed in line before the doctor, who was armed with a magnifying glass and examined their hair and in some instances under their arms, for parasites and vermin. In certain cases his examination was very superficial and his manner left nothing to be desired. A female stewardess, in attendance then looked down the loosened front of their dresses to assure herself that they had on clean underwear. As for the men, we had to strip stark naked, practically, at least, to below our knees and submit to an examination of our clothing and bodies for vermin and parasites. This crowning indignity did not come to the women until later.

When we reached Quarantine outside the harbor of New York a doctor and a female inspector came aboard. We were again segregated as before. This time the men got off comparatively easy, merely having to strip to the waist and have their underclothing (shirts) examined for vermin. The search was rewarded by the discovery of one "cootie" on a stowaway. The women, after having to pass in line, fully clothed, before the doctor, who treated each to one sharp glance, were left in charge of the female inspector, a woman whose entire manner was an affront and who showed by every word and action her utter disregard of the possibility of any of the finer feelings existing among third class passengers. To her was delegated what, with her glasses and the big electric light had been again installed. The women and children were herded together in one end of the room and ordered to strip, to the waist, in full exhibition they (formed in line and passed one at a time before this inspector, who subjected their clothing and bodies to a search for vermin and parasites.

As with the men, the search was rewarded by the discovery of one "cootie" in the underskirts of a child.

In the conducting of these examinations there was not the slightest attempt at privacy. Everything was done in public. There was no suspicion of screening for any other consideration for the finer sensibilities. The impression given is that lack of money, even temporarily, comes very near to being a crime in the eyes of the American authorities.

BULGARIA'S AEGEAN CLAIMS

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I regret that in reply to my communication on the question of Bulgaria's economic egress on the Aegean Mr. Mamartcheff has raised certain issues which, although not quite relevant to the subject, I cannot leave unanswered.

First, as to the attitude of Greece during the Great War, the charge made by your correspondent that Greece straddled the fence until allied victory was assured is quite at variance with the facts. "On Aug. 19, 1914," writes Mr. Winston Churchill in his remarkable book "The World Crisis," "Mr. Venizelos, then Prime Minister of Greece, with the approval which he had, astonishing to relate, obtained of King Constantine, formally placed at the disposal of the Entente Powers all the naval and military resources of Greece from the moment when they might be required." This "magnanimous offer," as Mr. Churchill calls it, made when allied fortunes were at their lowest ebb, was rejected by the Entente, Sir Edward Grey feared "that an alliance with Greece meant immediate war with Turkey and possibly Bulgaria."

At the general election held in June, 1915, the Greek people emphasized their resolve to enter the war on the obligation a large Venizelist majority. How this almost complete initial unanimity gradually degenerated into a divergence of views which eventually divided the Greek people into two irreconcilable camps is a story all the aspects of which have yet to be told. But it is safe to assert that the cross-purposes of allied diplomacy, the fact that Italy and Russia never wanted Greece in the war while Great Britain frowned upon her admittance until Bulgaria had entered on the opposite side, the parceling out by the Allies of Greek territory without so much as consulting the Greek Government, the blockade of the Greek coast, the incessant "wait for the Greek fleet; in short, the disregard by the Allies of the susceptibilities of the Greek people would be sufficient to account for the Allies' loss of ground in Greece, if there were no German sympathizers and propagandists to exploit the blunders of allied diplomacy.

Even so, by the end of 1916, Mr. Venizelos, who had with the greatest difficulty secured allied recognition, was able to put in the field 60,000 men, and the following year over 200,000 Greeks were participating in the Saloniki side show. With these and many other facts in mind, it takes quite a stretch of the imagination to describe the attitude of Greece as sitting on the fence.

The statement about "the unanimous opposition of all Bulgarian parties (except Radoslavoff's) to Ferdinand's war policy," does not hold water. Radoslavoff's pro-German policy was condorsed by all the bourgeois parties: the Democrats under Malinoff, the Narodniaks (Nationalists) under Gueshoff, Progressists under Daneff. Even the Socialists under Sakisoff and the Agrarians under Bekaloff were warm supporters of King Ferdinand's and his Premier's war policy. The files of the most representative Bulgarian newspapers, such as Narodni Prava, Preporetz, Mir, Outro, Dnevnik, offer striking proof of the well nigh complete unanimity of pro-Bulgarian public opinion during the war. Of all the parties only the extreme Socialists and among the politicians only Ghenadieff, who had been read out of Radoslavoff's party, and Stambuliisky, who did not at that time represent Agrarian sentiment, were opposed to the war.

"Until Bulgaria believes that Germany is not going to win the war, she will not be moved by any promises of other people's territory," Mr. Churchill was told by Sir Edward Grey, than whom no one worked harder to detach Bulgaria from Germany. To maintain that the Allies have collectively contracted a moral obligation toward an ex-enemy so hard-headed and deliberate is very remarkable, to say the least.

All they have is a legal obligation, defined by Article 48 of the Neuilly Treaty, to give Bulgaria an economic outlet on the Aegean. But how can Bulgaria's neighbors be convinced of the "pacific intentions" of her new government when its leader proclaims his readiness to abide by the treaty and in the same breath declares that he will reject any arrangement short of territorial outlet? Even if we take for attention that the present government is pro-Entente, it is quite meaningless even if exact; the Entente is dead and buried just as much as the Austro-German Alliance. Why talk in terms of 1914-1918 in the year of 1923?

But we are told that Western Thrace belongs to Bulgaria "by geography and by principles of economics." Now these are relative terms. Poland, a country much larger than Bulgaria, by apparently satisfying with access to an economic outlet at Danzig and Czechoslovakia, the most progressive of the succession States, has no outlet at all. Bulgaria, on the other hand, has no lack of means of commercial intercourse with the outer world; the Danube, direct connection with the European railway system, and, above all, the splendid Black Sea ports of Burghas and Varna have given ample scope to her natural resources and to the undoubted industry of her people with the result that her economic progress within less than half a century has been phenomenal.

Surely, it is not economic necessity that prompts the Bulgarian clamor for Western Thrace any more than it is jealousy of Bulgaria's economic development that is back of the refusal of Greece to part with it. To the militant Bulgarian mind the control of Southern Western Thrace is only a stepping stone to more extensive territorial acquisitions further west. Cavalla and Saloniki, which not long ago were included in the minimum territorial claims of Bulgaria, will be within striking distance of a Bulgarian army established in Western Thrace.

As for the ethnographical character of Western Thrace, the results of the census taken by General Charpy early in 1920 cannot be accepted as conclusive. Western Thrace had been under Bulgarian administration since 1913 and Bulgarization was carried out with great thoroughness during the war years both there and in Greek Macedonia which the Bulgarian Army invaded in 1916. Hence the Greek refusal to submit to a plebiscite shortly after the armistice. So far as the Greeks and Bulgarians of Western Thrace themselves are concerned there is a considerable Turkish contingent also—the former predominate on the coast (Dedeagatch, Makri, Maronia) and in the large towns of the hinterland (Xanthi, Gumuldina, Soufli, etc.), while the Bulgarians are most numerous in the rural districts especially near the Bulgarian frontier. This last circumstance should make it easy for those of them who "want to emigrate into Bulgaria to cross the frontier in accordance with the Greco-Bulgarian convention of June 27, 1919, concerning the voluntary and reciprocal emigration of Greek and Bulgarian minorities from Bulgaria and Greece respectively, a convention whose terms are eminently convenient and just to both parties.

GUTENBERG AND PRINTING

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The owners of Gutenberg Bibles or fragments thereof are cautioned against hastily assuming that their value will be lessened because of Frank H. Vizetelly's attempted annihilation of the claims made on behalf of Johann Gutenberg.

The Gutenberg-Coster controversy is as amusing and as unsatisfactory as the Shakespeare-Bacon affair. In a matter in which the evidence is either vague or circumstantial Mr. Vizetelly uses the word "undoubtedly" too frequently and accepts impossible dates too readily. Evidently he has a superficial knowledge of the controversy.

The earliest unimpugned document connecting Gutenberg with printing is the record of the Fust-Gutenberg lawsuit in 1455, relating presumably to the printing of the great Bible. The documents in the case are nearly all under suspicion and some of them are forgeries, skillfully (if foolishly) made at the beginning of the controversy by learned but dishonest German librarians and others for the patriotic purpose of making it impossible for any of Gutenberg's claims in support of Gutenberg impregnable. But those who accept Gutenberg as inventor need not rely upon such documents as have survived the assaults of the Costerians. Better evidence is found in the statements of printers contemporary with Gutenberg or contemporary with printers who had learned their art in Mainz.

Thus in 1472 Fichet, a professor in the Sorbonne in Paris, brought three German printers to Paris. Writing to a brother scholar in that year, Fichet says that these men told him that printing was invented by Johann Gutenberg. Gutenberg died about 1468, and the three printers—beginners in a new art of prime importance—must have known well how to be informed on a matter of such personal interest to themselves. It is a curious coincidence that prior to 1472 Peter Schoeffer invariably ascribed the invention to himself and his father-in-law, Johann Fust, but after 1472 he ceased to do so. In a book now before me, printed by Schoeffer's grandson in 1541, the invention is credited to the "ingenious Johann Gutenberg." This and other similar acknowledgments from the Schoeffer family effectually exclude Schoeffer from consideration as the inventor. It is known that printing was done in Germany in a small way prior to the printing of the Bible, and before Schoeffer became acquainted with the art which he practiced so magnificently.

But to go back to Gutenberg. In 1474 Ligname of Rome printed a book in which the invention is ascribed to Gutenberg. There is reason to regard this as a second edition printed in 1476. The invention is also ascribed to Gutenber

POWERFUL SPIRITUAL LEADERS WAKE JAPAN FROM MATERIALISM

Tenko Nishida, a Twentieth Century Buddha, in His Self-Sacrificing Life, Stirs Millions With His Preaching of the Golden Rule—Toyohiko Kagawa Feared by the Government for His Work in the Slums

By GARDNER L. HARDING.

WESTERNERS readily grant to Japan the ability to produce statesmen, soldiers, scientists, teachers and efficient administrators in the practical matters of this world. How the spiritual world is served in Japan, save for our definite conviction of Japan's mystic nationalism, is still a closed book to most of us. Yet today the moral life of the Japanese people is being profoundly stirred by two great religious leaders, men whose speculations and life stories are the direct opposite of militant nationalism.

Their influence upon the youth of the nation is tremendous, and though the two men are as wide apart as the poles in temperament, in personal example, and in direction of their teaching, each of them has planted his message in a book which has had a sale of over 200,000 copies, and each of them would earn distinction in any nation in the world.

These two contrasting leaders of modern Japanese spiritual life are Tenko Nishida, founder of the semi-monastic order of Itoen—or one torch in the darkness—and Toyohiko Kagawa, author of "Shisen O-Koete," or "Crossing the Death Line," the frankest interpretation of life in the Japanese slums that has been written in the present generation. The quality that makes both these men interesting to Westerners is that for all their mysticism they have chosen, not, to interpret the other-worldly past of the Japan of tradition, but to face boldly the complex, industrialised Japan of today.

They live, dress and eat like the commonest of common workmen in the midst of teeming slums which Japan has copied so faithfully from Western civilization. They inherit, in modern guise, the tradition of St. Francis of Assisi, of the mendicant Buddha himself, but their impress on modern life carries all the contrarieties and complexities which beset Tolstoy and Gandhi. Above all, they are essentially Japanese, and their recognition by the Japanese people indicates that there is an undercurrent of responsive moral appreciation in Japan of which we have no reliable record from the many writers who make the predominant egotism and materialism of that nation their perennial theme.

A Modern Buddha.

Neither could be called a Shintoist; both are far removed from the paternalistic religious doctrines of Japan's most widely tolerated faith. Nishida, of humble country parentage, has worked out his own rule of life through a train of self-denying service wherein he has never sought distinction or greatness in any form. If fame has come to him now in middle life, it is only because his fellow-countrymen have become attracted to the sheer force of moral consistency in this unlettered, unpresuming man, who, seeking the perfect life of unselfish service to his fellows, wandered for many years up and down the country performing the meanest tasks, cleaning cesspools, scaling fish, working as a rice coolie at the ports and subsisting on the waste rice that fell from the transport barrows, defying plague and contagion and refusing all but the meanest food and clothing in payment of the tasks of his livelihood.

Nishida's book, "Zange No Seikatsu," yields to the translator a meaning half way between "Life of Confession" and "Life of Repentance"; the title is lost in the nuances of a peculiarly Oriental self-revelation, but the content is a glowing chapter of the spiritual struggle of Japan to maintain some kind of integrity of soul amid the rank physical growths of the present age. If there is any philosophy in the book, it is the opposite of all the world thinks of as characteristic Japanese thought. Nishida seeks to win the world by a complete renunciation of all force, by avoiding clash and conflict, by a pervasive example of self-renunciation and unstudied service.

The immense sale of his book, the great following that has grown up around his central idea of the Itoen, a band of young men consecrated to his ideals, which has rapidly grown from the inspiration of its leader at Kyoto; more especially the influence he has spread among the youth of Japan and among artistic and sophisticated men in the cities, denote the genuineness of the message of this incongruous figure in the midst of a reputedly egocentric and a materialised people, and make it all the more remarkable that no translation of his book exists in a foreign language, and that the world outside of Japan knows all but nothing about him.

Nishida has been described as 10 per cent. Communist, 15 per cent. Christian, and 75 per cent. Buddhist, but the description errs on the conventional side, for it misses the very large proportion that is purely of his own creation and is indefinable in any set terms. It is likewise misleading to call Kagawa a Christian and the product of Christian missions, for the description leaves out most of the essentials.

When Kagawa graduated from the theological school it was not the missionaries who sent him, already in an advanced state of consumption, to live in the Shinkawa district of Kobe, the filthiest slum of all Japan. Nor was the miracle by which in six years in this environment, living in every detail the life of the people around him, working from dawn to midnight in a sweat-shop of human service of his own choosing, Kagawa has emerged a sound and healthy man, attributable to any form of doctrinal religious implanted conviction.

Friend to the Poor.

Kagawa is a true Japanese of a type of which as yet the Occident knows nothing. He is a lover of the poor, but unlike Nishida he has no abhorrence of conflict. The sturdiness of his espousal of the cause of his people is manifest in the fact that five times he has been to jail for attacking sweated labor. He is a leader of the Japanese labor movement; his "Psychology of Poverty" is a sociological classic; his "Namida No Nitoban," or "Two Measures of Tears," is a group of poems wherein he has written the Japanese counterpart of "The Song of the Shirt" and Elizabeth Barrett Browning's "The Cry of the Children"; and his two autobiographical books, "Shisen O-Koete," or "Crossing the Death Line," and its sequel, "One Who Shoots at the Sun," the former of which has been read by a million people in Japan and has been translated into English, have given him at 35 the promise of a reputation equal to Tolstoy's.

In all he has written sixteen books, which he has illustrated by pen and ink sketches of his own drawing, he edits three newspapers and writes for a dozen magazines, he conducts an industrial research bureau, leads an incipient farm bloc among the long oppressed tenant farmers of the countryside, addresses countless meetings, organizes trade unions—and through it all conducts a little church in Shinkawa for men and women who have to be at work by 6 in the morning. He earns from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars a year by his writing, but he uses none of it for himself.

Today he dwells in the foul Shinkawa alley where he has lived for years, in a dark little room ten feet square, and the suit of clothes he commonly wears cost less than two dollars. He lives literally "beyond the death line," for last year he had to cancel a trip to America because of a persistent attack of trachoma, which he had been too busy to cure. His Christianity is a species of early Christianity of high tension and perfect simplicity.

Japan Grows Spiritually.

But it is not Kagawa, and it is not Nishida, who are in themselves so interesting, as it is the modern Japanese nation which is giving such men a due proportion in its life that commands a rectification, one must insist, of the standards of foreign appreciation. For after all, this is the same nation which only a few years ago regarded tolerantly a régime of torture and infamous cruelty in Korea; whose Black Dragon Society kept before the people during the early years of the war an ambition to dominate by force and conquest all the nations of mankind; a nation infinitely skeptical of ancient faiths and difficult of access for new ones; a nation whose young strength has been spent in enormous material growth at the expense of the terrible and unremitting deterioration of its working millions. If this picture seems overdrawn, it must be remembered that not by contrast with the West but by following not wisely but too well the example of the West has Japan come to this condition.

But Nishida and Kagawa remind us that Japan, and especially young Japan, is susceptible to a moral reaction from the husks of material power. Such men are not accidents of the age. A good proportion of their million and more readers are thinking with them. If they are too impractical and otherworldly—though both of them work and act very much in this world—it is only because modern Japan has created standards too oppressively worldly for its people.

Yet it does not seem that the life of a man like Nishida belongs to a world of electricity and steam and organized scientific charity. It is hard to put together, for he has no biographer, and the physical details are fragmentary and far between. He was born and brought up in the country provinces of Nagahama, near Lake Biwa, a frail, precocious youth inclined to moral contemplation. His family was in modest circumstances, yet of sufficient eminence that the young man attracted the attention of the Governor of Nagahama, who gave him a book by the famous Buddhist moralist, Ninomiya Sontoku. The reading of this book was a turning point in his life.

In those days, as now, a young Japanese could avoid military service by spending an equivalent period of his youthful life as a colonist in the northern island of Hokkaido, and Nishida eagerly accepted this way out of what he had come to regard as the abhorred life of soldiering, and attempted in the arduous, pioneering life in Hokkaido to put in practice some of Sontoku's doctrines of moral perfection through unselfishness. He became a sort of industrial contractor in co-operative enterprise; he remained, as he had been brought up, a Buddhist, and he married and embarked on the strictly laid out paths of Japanese family life.

He failed to become a business man, even a co-operative business man, because his workmen and his creditors were bound by an economic system which did not recognize the unselfish doctrines he confidently anticipated putting into practice. He then decided that if his beliefs were vagaries, no other human being would share the penalties of his failure. After making what settlement he could, he became literally a wandering hermit, leaving his wife, his possessions and his family to seek a solitary understanding of the meaning of life. His own story of his wanderings is incredibly naïve; if Oriental literature in the past were not full of similar human experiences, it would seem incredibly over-simplified.

He began to subsist on stray rice-grain thrown down by the road; he called at kitchen doors in the country and asked for work to do, the meanest and lowliest drudgery, such as cleaning the family cesspools, never asking for pay save only for a place to sleep and kitchen scraps to eat. Such a life, he said, calmed the mind; but what amazed him was that people whom he served in this way, the kindly, simple people of the Japanese countryside, saw nothing odd or strange in his life of service, but humbly regarded him as a saint. He resolutely refused choice food or clothing better than that of the commonest peasant.

There is almost a Biblical story about one household, distracted by dissension and idleness, where the purity and humility of his unmurmuring industry in mean tasks healed a long-enduring feud both amid the family and among the servants of the house. He had to refuse costly gifts and he had to leave when he felt he was needed no more, but from then on there was something about him of the aura of a holy man.

His wanderings brought him to Kyoto, and here, still pursuing his vagrant life, "bothering no man," as he says, he was a coolie for a time in the house of Masataro Sawayanagi, Vice Chancellor of the University of Kyoto, a wealthy scholar, who later became Vice Minister of Education. It was Sawayanagi who saw that this man, though a mystic and a wanderer, had a genius for organization, and induced him to form the order of the Itoen, or one torch, among the disciples who had come to him.

Like St. Francis.

This Franciscan experiment reacted much as it did in the case of St. Francis himself in the Middle Ages. Rich and educated young men came to him to find peace and service in life. Dramatists and poets of the Imperial theatre, men of culture far above his own, forsook earthly possessions and sought through his example to find some of the mystic ardor of old Japan.

But modern life claimed the minds of this little group, for this is the age of industrialism, and as in the case of St. Francis, wealthy devotees began to embarrass the Itoen by leaving to its name factories and mines, to be worked on unselfish and co-operative principles. This dual conflict still troubles Nishida, for once in what he felt was the unescapable field of his responsibility, he strove to retain self-renunciation and humility even while wordly possessions piled up around him.

How this submissive cleaner of drains has come to be, in a small way, an industrial magnate, is an amazing chapter in the moral life of Japan. It was during his Kyoto days that he wrote his marvelous book, "Zange No Seikatsu," a thin little volume of not more than 250 pages, a confession of his faith never intended for more than his immediate followers. In a month it had become a famous book, and its proceeds alone brought him a small fortune, not one yen of which, so far as is known, has he spent for his own uses.

It is an inveterate custom in Japan for fathers of refractory sons to send their boys to a famous teacher, whose example may do more than years of book instruction toward bringing them to some stability in moral understanding. Here also Nishida, through the Itoen, has become a national figure. There is a story of his independence in this connection which will bear telling. The Honganyi, the high priest of the Buddhist faith, had failed to reform a youth under these conditions, and turned him over to Nishida for tolerance's sake. The young man became a faithful disciple and had a real "revelation" in the Itoen, whereupon the Honganyi demurred at the "irregularity" of Nishida's theology.

"Your theology is doubtless perfect," replied Nishida, "yet he failed to understand it as he has understood mine; if you think so little of my religion, take him back and reform him yourself."

A Miracle in Modern Life.

"So train yourself that you can serve anybody in any way requested," says Nishida; "this is humility and the beginning of the life of true fellowship * * * All belongs to all. * * * When you probe the matter to its depths, all the conflicts of human life are rooted in egotism. * * * The desire for possession is the root of all evil."

Such is the communism that this radical Buddhist, with his strong attraction toward early Christianity, is spreading in Japan. How far it will impress the nation in a practical sense is not foreseeable, especially since Nishida does not come in conflict with a government or an opposing order of life save by pure force of example.

Kagawa, with his aggressive contrasting Christianized spirit of leadership over men organized in a party and a cause, is in much more personal danger from the authorities. But the influence of these two men on the springs of spontaneous moral life in Japan is profound; they are symbols of forces far more powerful than themselves which are destined to make history in a nation whose true relationship with the Western world is as yet unrealized.

MISDEEDS OF EX-SOLDIERS LAID TO EFFECTS OF WAR

THOUSANDS of service men now confined in jails over the country will get an opportunity to prove that they were mentally or physically unfit when sent to jail, if the plans of the Rehabilitation Department of the American Legion go through.

It is the opinion of Joseph Sparks, chief rehabilitation officer of the Legion, that a large percentage of these men will be found to have "drifted into crime" as a result of poor physical or mental condition when released after the war. He estimates that at least 26,000 such men are confined. The Executive Committee of the American Legion met recently in Indianapolis at national headquarters to consider the matter. It is impossible for the Veterans' Bureau in Washington to take over such a job, according to Mr. Sparks.

"The people of this country should know about this matter and make it their business to see what can be done for the men who are in prison today, many of them through no fault of their own, but because of after-war effects," he said. "It is shocking to think that there are thousands of men from all walks of life confined for crimes that many of them did almost unknowingly, because they were so removed from normal health and strength at the time.

"We have made investigation in some States where conditions are worse than in others, and have found that many of the men should have been in hospitals, instead of jail, so bad is their condition, and the jail life has not helped.

"When these reports first came to us they were hard to believe. But the work done by Dr. Lorenz, a service man in Wisconsin, proves that the reports were not exaggerated, and that many of the men were not themselves when they performed criminal acts for which they were put into prison. Those in the Middle Western States seem to have suffered more in this respect than in other parts of the country.

"We believe that the Governor of each State should appoint a committee, including a Legion man, a public official and a citizen, to investigate and decide what number of the men should have rehearings."

Dr. Stanley Rinehart, one of the specialists of the Veterans' Bureau, agrees with Mr. Sparks.

"It is a wonder that there are not more of our ex-service men in jail," said Dr. Rinehart, "so helpless is the future of many of them, coming out of the army with shattered nerves and compelled to adjust themselves to after-war conditions.

"The average man that went into the war was peace-loving up to that time. Suddenly he was taken from his pursuits and made to become a bloodthirsty animal, with killing his principal work. Farm boys, clerks and others were turned into one of the greatest armies we have ever know. Then, after months of killing and bloodshed, the tocsin of peace was sounded and the soldier was told that he once more was a free man to take up again his peaceful mode of living. But that could not be done immediately. Some of the men had killed until killing became a habit. They had been cared for with that as their only occupation until it was hard for them to return to former ways of living and take upon themselves once more the task of being good citizens.

"That is the way I account for so many of our soldiers being in jail. They were thrown so suddenly upon their own resources that they could not adjust themselves, and so drifted into crime. We have got hold of as many of them as we can and are giving them hospital treatment. But it has been impossible to do this with all of them in secluded communities or congested portions of our great cities. The public must become aroused to this condition and the States see to it that every ex-service man in prison gets an opportunity to have a rehearing if he deserves it, or hospital treatment, instead of a jail cell, if that is what he needs."

BRITISH HORSES FOR U.S. ARMY.

SPECIALLY built for the transfer of horses from the United States to Great Britain, vessels of the Atlantic Transport Line may now reverse their course. Agents from this side have been examining horses in the County of Somerset and other parts of the West of England for cavalry remounts.

British officers found during the war in South Africa that cavalry remounts descending from thoroughbred stock were the best for military purposes, and such animals are constantly bred in the British Isles, particularly in Ireland.

Horses bred in the West of England are mostly of smaller stature and appropriately built for hill climbing. United States military agents are said to have paid an average of $400 each for four-year-olds likely to make capable remounts. Much curiosity has been aroused in England by this profitable advent of American horse owners.

VALVE-IN-HEAD Buick MOTOR CARS

Why Buick is "The Standard of Comparison"

It has been a fixed Buick policy always to anticipate motoring demands by developing new and advanced features of design and construction.

This has been one of the many factors contributing to Buick's great popularity—a popularity tangibly expressed in the fact that Buick is well on its way towards the manufacture of its two-millionth motor car.

Buick recognizes it as a distinct obligation to live up to the spirit and letter of its slogan "When Better Automobiles Are Built, Buick Will Build Them".

There is no reason why you should not now satisfy your aspiration to own a Packard, instead of a second-choice car.

Packard Single-Six can be owned at a lower cost per day than those lower priced cars which must be exchanged every year or two.

Packard Single-Six is actually more economical of gas, oil and tires—and therefore costs less to operate—than many lighter and less luxurious cars. Also, Packard standardized service reduces maintenance costs to an astonishingly low level.

JOHN SIDDALL'S SUCCESS FOUNDED UPON ONE IDEA

He Believed That the Personal Problems of Daily Life Were the Most Interesting to the Average American, and He Won Hosts of Readers.

JOHN M. SIDDALL'S death last week at his home at Ardsley-on-Hudson brought to end one of the most picturesque careers in American letters; a career as striking as any of those that he, as an editor, was fond of relating in the pages of his American Magazine.

The outstanding facts of his life have been told, how he rushed from Oberlin College to begin, before sunset on his graduation day, his newspaper work on the Cleveland Plain Dealer; and how he rose within a very few years to his position as the guiding genius of a monthly magazine with a huge circulation.

Behind the bare biographical facts is a story, yet to be told, of a personality that was strong enough to draw to its possessor the good will of hundreds of thousands of people. Mr. Siddall, in spite of his comparative youth—his class at Oberlin met in twenty-fifth annual reunion only last month—was one of the outstanding editors of his time. Concerning him, as concerning the scores of eminent men whose careers he held up for the emulation of the world, the question is asked: "What was the secret of his success?"

Probably the answer is, "His faith in an idea."

"His idea," says a person long associated with him, "was that people are more interested in themselves than in anything else in the world. That personal problems mean more to the average man or woman than social or community problems. That the question, 'How to make a living,' is more vital than the question, 'How to regulate the railroads.'

"That was John Siddall's idea. He served it faithfully, and it served him in return. Call it a clever business idea, if you will, or a piece of highly enlightened selfishness, and the fact still remains that his idea filled a great need in America and has done an incalculable amount of good."

Mr. Siddall's Big Chance.

The magazine world has its ups and downs, its high peaks and its panics, like any other world that depends upon popular fancy and confidence for its prosperity. A "low" came in the magazine curve fifteen or twenty years ago. The staid publications of the venerable New England type had been superseded in public favor by the thunderous magazines that many shocked persons of the Mark Hanna era liked to call "muckrakers."

These new ventures were as intellectual as the New Englanders had dared to be, and more useful, perhaps, in that they undertook to grapple—and did grapple masterfully—with the largest problems, tendencies and evils in sight. But even their popularity faded. It may be that they thundered too loud and that the times were not ready for such crashing music. Not even with a staff that included such brilliant minds as Ray Stannard Baker, Ida M. Tarbell, Lincoln Steffens and John S. Phillips could headway be made against conditions.

The story goes that the publishers of the American found themselves slipping and offered the editorship to the man or woman on the staff who could suggest the best life-saving idea; and that John M. Siddall came forward with the desired idea and won the prize.

Whether the story is apochryphal or not, Mr. Siddall was the directing force of the magazine from that time to the day of his death, and by adhering to his idea rigorously he rose to be one of the most notably successful magazine editors in history.

No other magazine published today is so filled with one man's personality as was his. Mr. Siddall wrote for years a short monthly editorial headed "Sid Says." But that was the least important of his appearances before his readers. He is as clearly seen in any and every other page between the covers, sturdily maintaining his idea of what the reading public, or a big portion of it, wants in the way of food for thought.

He saw that the ruling passion of a great class of Americans is to make good: not necessarily to make money, but to make the best of themselves, of their talents and their opportunities; to acquit themselves creditably despite unfavoring circumstances. And he took those Americans seriously.

His Optimistic Gospel.

The fruits of his idea are seen partly in the circulation books, and still more abundantly in the hold that Siddall had upon the imagination and the gratitude of his public. He once said that his public was not a fixed quantity. It grew up to him, was influenced by him and passed on, still bearing his imprint, though perhaps conscious of him no longer. He aimed to provide struggling young ambition and fainting old ambition with the stimulus that they needed to help them surmount their difficulties. He showed that daily business life is adventure just as surely as life in the remote and romantic regions far from the drab city and the workaday farm. He glorified that daily adventure.

Moreover, Siddall preached courage, obedience, cheerfulness, loyalty, all the virtues. He dispensed morality in limitless amount from a titanic pulpit, and he "put it over" not by the dull method of homily, but by the adroit method of telling stories out of real life.

His message was that it is possible for every man and every woman to rise to credit and renown by putting to use the simple, every-day powers that lie within every personality. He appealed to those powers in his readers by exhibiting an overwhelming gallery of portraits of men and women who had succeeded through no miracle or lucky secret, but through the application of common sense.

A Dual Personality.

In reality, there were two John M. Siddalls, and so different they were that, could they have been separately personified, they might have walked side by side through all Broadway without being recognized as twins.

There was the executive known to the literary agent, the paper salesman, the printer and the ink dealer. That Siddall was as businesslike a man as one could find in all Wall Street or the wholesale drygoods district. "A shrewd, snappy, shortspoken man conscious of his power," says a person who had business contact with him. "He signed letters 'll the while you talked with him."

Then there was the Siddall whom few ever saw, but whom thousands of people knew more truly than they knew their next-door neighbors; a man whom they admired and loved for his neighborliness, indeed, and for the help he lent them in their daily living.

By some it is said that Siddall was no editor; that he was a clever advertising expert instead, who exploited benevolently a large class of people; and that he capitalized youthful aspiration to his own profit, and flattered the self-esteem of folk cursed with the inferiority complex. There are always two ways of looking at any remarkable human achievement.

It would not be safe to speak disparagingly of Mr. Siddall to those thousands of good citizens who know him through his work and who look back to something printed by him or by some writer of his that gave them the impulse to better their lot in life.

A sophisticated person once said, "No, I never read Siddall's stuff."

"Why not?" was asked.

"Because," replied the cynic, "it is so darned helpful."

But because it was "so darned helpful," it reached a circulation close to the 2,000,000 mark.

Ask that host of good folk which was the real Siddall: the clever business executive who signed his letters while his caller talked to him, or the Siddall who showed them the way to promotion and pay—and you know the answer you will get.

Editing Requires Business Talent.

"After all," says a student of the magazine market, "it takes a good business man in these days of sharp competition and heavy costs to be a good editor. The old-fashioned genius who got out a magazine to please himself and his exclusive intellectual set would not travel far today. The woods are still full of that kind, but nobody hears much about them. They haven't grasped the fact that democracy has come into its share of learning at last.

John M. Siddall

They still live in the ancient highbrow delusion that literacy is confined to a favored few.

"Or else they go to the other extreme and assume that the masses, having learned to read, are still primitive and near to the beast in their tastes. But now and then you find an editor, like Siddall, who has the insight to see life as it is and to serve its needs.

"The intelligentsia may wrinkle their noses at Siddall's sincerity; but I believe that if he had a billion dollars to play with and his life to start over again, he would still follow his idea. He believed in it; and the fact that legions of business men responded to it proved that it was sound and valuable."

Mr. Siddall once wrote: "Victory is what we are interested in. Victory for the individual over the odds that beset him. There are all kinds—sickness, lack of education, opportunity or money, environment, bad habits, absurd weaknesses, every sort of mental, physical and spiritual barrier of 'The Pilgrim's Progress.'"

His Editorial Methods.

The success idea had been tried before as an editorial keynote, and had failed. Perhaps those who tried it were too abstract in applying it. They advised their readers that "Early to bed and early to rise" would make them healthy, wealthy and wise; and then, after a few months or years, they suspended publication. Mr. Siddall took the idea and dressed it up in modern clothes. He dramatized it. He believed in wise saws, but he went after modern instances.

Across his stage walked the leading people of the living world—and not always those who were oftenest in the headlines or on the lips of the man in the street. He went into every profession and discovered the big hits in almost every line of endeavor. The brilliant Mrs. Fiske, in one number, gave place in the next to the pair of unknown East Siders who, on a margin of 35 cents, put on a rejected and re-rejected play and stood to become millionaires before Broadway should tire of it.

Mr. Siddall combed the country for heroes and heroines of living stories. In a single month he told the life histories of an attorney who organized the farmers in co-operative marketing; a man who rose from office boy to the Presidency of a bank note company; a woman lawyer who became a Supreme Court Judge; a railway man who made it a rule to like the people he worked for, and so climbed to the highest office on the road; a widow who, when it became necessary for her to support her fatherless children, attained high rank as a writer; a minister who increased his usefulness by studying the art of drawing crowds; a blind man who repaired automobiles and conducted an orchestra; and a Texan who made a fortune finding out what armadillos were good for.

Even this long list does not exhaust Mr. Siddall's offerings for that month. He never lost sight of his idea in two decades of editorial control. A writer offered him an article on wheat raising in Canada; such a piece as would have made acceptable copy for the best of editors in the nineties; a piece as informative as a dictionary.

"Now, see here," said Editor Siddall. "This is all very fine. But rewrite it. Tell how somebody up in that country made a fortune raising wheat, and then I'll talk to you."

So, too, when Edwin P. Norwood, publicity man for the greatest circus on earth, submitted an article on the training of wild animals. The editor said: "This piece would be mighty interesting to the animal-training profession, or to any one who expected to take it up as a life work. It's good science, no doubt. But my readers are not lion tamers, and never expect to be. Try again. Make it interesting to them."

He followed his idea as strictly in buying fiction. Many a writer has received a gentle rejection that read: "This is a lovely story, old man. But, you know, it isn't our kind." To pass the Siddall censorship a story had to contain heroism in overcoming obstacles, and enough of it to be an inspiration to the greatest possible number of readers.

Courageous at the End.

The daily papers have told that Mr. Siddall died gamely, as the hero of one of his stories would have died, keeping the news of his fatal ailment to himself, continuing his work to the last possible hour, planning magazine numbers that he knew would be issued by another hand than his.

Persons who had business correspondence with him in the last few months have noted an unexplained kindliness in the tone of his letters and a show of personal interest greater, perhaps, than the occasion warranted.

One of his last bits of philosophy, written when he knew that he was to be cut off in the prime of life, had to do with the vastness of the universe and the comparative insignificance of man. There was no hint in it of his own sorrow. He drew a whimsical picture of potato bugs looking through a telescope, discovering the haystack on the next farm and thinking that they had seen to the end of creation. He concluded in this characteristic fashion:

"The moral of these sad reflections is this: Everything is relative—everything has untold possibilities. You have seen no farther than the haystack into the possibilities of your job, or the development of your talents, or the refinement of your character. In other words—don't get the swelled head over what you have accomplished, or how much you know. It isn't much. Instead of sticking out your chest, go ahead with your study. See whether, before you die, you can't get a look past the haystack and maybe as far as Deacon Oldguy's brand-new windmill."

GIRL SCOUTS PRACTICE MARKETING AND COOKING

Camp Andree, at Briarcliff, Includes Budget Making and Household Provisioning in Its Program—Every Girl Must Take Her Turn at Buying and Preparing Food.

AT Camp Andree, the National Girl Scouts' Camp in Briarcliff Manor, 500 girls will study the problem of the high cost of living this Summer and learn how to make both ends meet. The camp is run as a school of experience, and the girls are taught that even in New York State, where living costs are higher than elsewhere, one person may live in comfort on $5 a week for food, may have fresh fruit and cereal for breakfast, plenty of milk and eggs, salads, fresh vegetables and meats and desserts at both luncheon and dinner in unending variety.

The camp occupies one of the prettiest spots in Westchester County, hidden behind the hills of private estates, a little world of its own. Here are boating, bathing, water carnivals, mountain climbing, hiking, gardening and, best of all, marketing and cooking.

One of the buildings on the beautiful estate which Senator William A. Clark presented to the National Council of the Scouts is an old storage barn. This has been turned into the camp market, and here the girls get the training that is to equip them as capable managers of household budgets.

The girls live in units of ten and are required to take turns in marketing and cooking for their units. Board at the camp costs $10 a week. Five of this goes for camp upkeep, tents, blankets, cots, &c. The rest pays for food, camp money being used in place of United States currency in the girls' transactions in the camp market.

When a unit assembles, its leader receives $5 worth of camp money for each girl in her patrol. Within that allotment the unit must keep. At first the authorities let the girls plan their own meals and do their own selecting of foods, but it was found better to engage a dietitian to order the daily menu. The girls are now guided to that extent, but the purchasing and the cooking is in their own hands.

They must know how to buy in order that the money shall last through the week. They must see to it that enough food is bought to comply with the requirements of the menu, and no more. If they are wise in their purchasing, no unit will go hungry and cry for more. If they are unwise there will be complaint from unfed, healthy youngsters, or there will be waste, which will mean shortage later.

Every Girl Scout at Camp Andree must do her bit in the work of marketing. She must also learn to cook specified foods in three ways. Thus there is variety in the round of meals, and thus, too, knowledge is gained which, the authorities hope, will go far toward solving household problems when the girls return to their homes. The system is not a money maker for the camp, yet the girls pay the same prices as those asked in city stores.

While wisdom rather than frugality is the aim, there is an incentive to save, for any money left over by any unit at the end of the week is banked, and it is the plan of the girls that the fund thus accumulated shall pay for some permanent improvement in the camp. The motto, "Waste not, want not," benefits, therefore, the girls themselves, their homes and the Scout organization.

COAL MINE AS HEALTH RESORT

SEVENTY-FIVE years a coal miner is the record of Peter Stark of Thankerton Colliery, Holytown, near Glasgow, Scotland. He is now 84 years old, and has spent three-quarters of a century in working for the Holytown coal field. He entered the pits when, as a boy of 8, he went with bare feet to lend his father aid in the mine.

INTEGRITY Studebaker SERVICE

Announcement

THE STUDEBAKER CORPORATION OF AMERICA is pleased to announce to its customers, friends, and the public generally, its complete line of new

1924 Model Studebaker Cars

Avoiding the superlatives frequently used in automobile advertisements, the Corporation desires to faithfully state the facts concerning these cars and the reasons why the public should buy them.

THE CARS

In design, quality of materials, standard of workmanship, durability, refinements, performance, freedom from repairs, and price, the Studebaker 1924 Model Cars are distinctly the greatest intrinsic values the Corporation has ever offered.

Every improvement the safety and practicability of which have been verified by engineering tests is embodied in these new cars.

The Big-Six

THE BIG-SIX LINE comprises four models, mounted on the standard 126-inch chassis with 60 H. P. 3⅜ x 5 inch motor:

7-passenger Touring Car - $1750 5-passenger Coupe - $2550
5-passenger Speedster - $1835 7-passenger Sedan - $2750
all prices f. o. b. factory

Refinements and a few minor mechanical changes have been made in the Big-Six, which has established an enviable record for five years. Our large production accounts for its low price. It is a car of the highest grade, comparable to the best.

The Special-Six

THE SPECIAL-SIX LINE comprises four models, mounted on the standard 119-inch chassis with 50 H. P. 3½ x 5 inch motor:

2-passenger Roadster - $1325 5-passenger Coupe - $1975
5-passenger Touring Car - $1350 5-passenger Sedan - $2050
all prices f. o. b. factory

Radiator, hood, cowl, and body changes have been made in the Special-Six, with minor mechanical changes and refinements in the chassis. The Special-Six has for five successive years added luster to the name STUDEBAKER. It is one of the most satisfactory and finest cars on the market. It is as good in every respect as the Big-Six, except that it is smaller, and costs less to produce, and therefore sells for less.

The Light-Six

3-passenger Roadster - $975 2-pass. Coupe-Roadster - $1225
5-passenger Touring Car - $995 5-passenger Sedan - $1550
all prices f. o. b. factory

No body or mechanical changes except refinements have been made in the Light-Six. Over 130,000 Light-Sixes have been produced in the new, modern $30,000,000 Studebaker plant at South Bend, Indiana, under most economical and almost ideal manufacturing conditions. In our judgment, it stands out as the greatest value and the closest approach to mechanical perfection in moderate priced cars yet produced.

THE REASONS WHY

With $90,000,000 of actual net assets and $45,000,000 invested in plants, Studebaker has ample physical facilities to manufacture most economically.

Studebaker's organization of manufacturing executives, engineers, metallurgists, chemists, inspectors, and skilled mechanics is second to none in the industry. The design of Studebaker cars and the workmanship upon them conform to the highest principles of engineering standards and mechanical practice known to the industry.

Best of Materials Used

Studebaker cars contain the finest known grades of iron, steel, aluminum, tires, electrical equipment, glass, bearings, etc. No better materials for automobile manufacture exist. Sheet aluminum has but one-third the tensile strength of sheet steel, and consequently, Studebaker uses sheet steel for its bodies.

By the manufacture of drop forgings, castings, stampings and the machining, assembling and finishing of motors, axles, frames, transmissions, bodies, tops, etc., and the consequent elimination of middlemen's profits, coupled with lower overhead factory costs per car arising from quantity production and low commercial expenses, Studebaker's costs are kept at an economically low point possible of attainment only by manufacturers with vast physical and financial resources.

Bodies Unexcelled

The bodies of Studebaker cars are not excelled in quality of materials and craftsmanship, by any cars on the market. The Coupe and Sedan closed bodies are magnificent examples of the coach builder's art.

Merit Wins

The sales of Studebaker cars for the past six years have shown each and every year a progressive increase. 81,880 cars were sold in the first six months of 1923, as against 60,053 for the same period last year. Only products of merit can make such growth.

POWER COMFORT

DISSENSION has rent the peace and quiet of the University of Tennessee, at Knoxville, much as it did at Amherst College earlier in the year. But the outcome has been different. The President of the Tennessee institution has won, temporarily at least, over the insurgent faction of his Faculty, whereas Dr. Meiklejohn at Amherst had to step down.

A link exists between the Amherst row and the Tennessee row, in that Bolton Smith of Memphis, one of the Tennessee Trustees, is the father of one of the Amherst seniors who refused to accept their diplomas last month because of the resignation of Dr. Meiklejohn. Mr. Smith led the minority of the Trustees at Knoxville last Tuesday in fighting for what he considered the liberalization of the university, just as his son had stood for the same idea at the New England school. He lost the fight, as did his son, for the Trustees voted against him.

The trouble began last March when Dr. Jesse Williams Sprowls, who has been teaching psychology, consented to instruct some advanced students in genetic psychology. He agreed to do this without any extra pay, because of his interest in their advancement in the subject. In teaching this class he ordered for parallel reading several copies of Professor James Harvey Robinson's book, "The Mind in the Making." These volumes were received by the University Co-operation Book Store. They had not yet been distributed to the students when Professor John A. Thackston, head of the Department of Education, and Dr. Sprowls's official superior, happened to come into the "Co-op" and saw them.

Professor Thackston immediately ordered the "Co-op" authorities to send the books back to the publisher. "It is not a wise book," he was quoted as saying. The books were returned, and the first Dr. Sprowls knew about it was when he received a letter from the publishers. Professor Thackston's peremptory action roused Dr. Sprowls to protest to his superior and to the administration. As a consequence, Professor Thackston recommended to Dean James D. Hoskins of the college and to President Morgan of the university that Dr. Sprowls should not be re-elected for the next year. These gentlemen supported Professor Thackston's action.

Because of the summary manner in which Dr. Sprowls had been discharged, other professors and instructors at the university began to wonder what security of tenure they had and to what extent they could discuss academic matters in consonance with their beliefs. "How shall we feel safe in expressing ourselves frankly to our students and to university officials unless we have a guarantee?" they asked.

A number went to Dr. Morgan and told him how they felt. Others made similar expressions to Dean Hoskins, and still others had meetings among themselves, discussing whether the American Association of University Professors could not be induced to make an investigation of the Sprowls discharge to see if the freedom of academic thought and the security of tenure had been involved in it. This nation-wide association was organized several years ago to protect university professors in frank expression of their beliefs and to save them from dismissal without a hearing.

Students Enter the Quarrel.

The Faculty meetings were not conclusive, but led to a petition to the association for an investigation, and likewise to intimations by the Faculty group that it believed that the university Faculty should be allowed to participate in the government of the institution. Rumors to this effect became circulated among the students.

In a few weeks an anonymous publication, called "The Independent Truth," began to appear. It was distributed at night on the campus. The personnel of its editorial staff was kept a secret, although it became known that leaders of the student body in scholarship, athletics and student standing were taking part.

The Independent Truth pleaded for a more friendly attitude toward students from the administration and asked for student and Faculty participation in administration. Its appearance caused a sensation.

After a few weeks The Independent Truth suggested the adoption by the Board of Trustees of a "constitution" for the university to insure to Faculty members and students their "rights" in the institution. The specific demands included:

Student participation in student problems; student control of student athletics; student control of student publications; general student supervision of student activities; student representation at administration conferences, at least in regard to all student problems discussed; and Faculty safeguard in tenure and liberty of speech. It was urged that a committee of Faculty members should be formed, which should be the sole tribunal to hear charges brought against professors.

Peace Efforts Fail.

After several issues of the paper had been printed and the feelings of the students and part of the Faculty had become heated, Dr. Maurice Mulvania, dean of the Pre-Medical School Department of the university, endeavored to bring the discordant elements into harmony. He thought that any intensification of the estrangement—even its continuance—would harm the university materially.

So Dr. Mulvania went to President Morgan and talked things over with him. His impression, he said later, was that the President was quite in accord with his ideas. Dr. Mulvania told Dr. Morgan that he wished to canvass the Faculty and to bring from all the members their answer to the question, "How can we improve our university?" "Go ahead," he quoted Dr. Morgan as saying to him, and the Dean told friends that Dr. Morgan was desirous of composing the differences and satisfying the aspirations of the Faculty for a hand in the administration.

Accordingly, Dr. Mulvania canvassed a considerable part of the Faculty, asking them his question. Of thirty-one who were asked the question twenty-seven replied that they would advise some change allowing a greater participation of the Faculty in student affairs. Dr. Mulvania so reported to Dr. Morgan.

Thus affairs rested through the graduation exercises, with the Sprowls case still unsettled, and the impression gained ground that there would be no reinstatement of Dr. Sprowls, but that the dispute otherwise was at an end. But in the last week in June a bombshell was thrown into the Faculty camp. One by one professors were called before Dean James D. Hoskins and were asked to reply to a questionnaire, a stenographer taking their answers in shorthand.

This questionnaire went with detail into the professor's knowledge of the petition to the American Association of University Professors to investigate the Sprowls case. One question was whether the professor had signed the document; another whether he had been asked to sign; and a third demanded the name of the person who had asked him to sign. Others related to the part, if any, taken by the professor in the publication of The Independent Truth and in the so-called "constitution" for preservation of Faculty and student rights.

Popular Professors Dismissed.

After the questionnaire had been answered the official axe began to fall. On June 26 it became noised about that Judge John R. Neal, for thirteen years a member of the Law School Faculty, had been told that he would not be re-engaged next year. Dr. Neal was probably the best loved professor at the university; students went to him for counsel. His friends say that he had actively discouraged the student insurrection and had urged calmness and moderation upon the leaders.

Scarcely had Dr. Neal been dismissed when it was learned that Dr. Robert S. Ellis of the Department of Psychology had also been let go. Dr. Ellis's notice came as soon as he had answered the questionnaire and had admitted signing the petition asking for the association's probe into the Sprowls case.

These two discharges raised a row. Dr. Neal's friends in legion besieged Dr. Morgan. After a period of, "I have nothing to say," the President told them, "Dr. Neal does not fit into the organization." This led The Knoxville News, which had been editorially fighting the Faculty's battles, to say: "There is something wrong with an organization which has no place for the brilliant mind, high character and lovable personality of Dr. Neal."

But the Ellis case was not the last. For five days one official head a day was the record of the administration. Dr. Robert Somerville Radford, for fifteen years Professor of Latin and Roman Archaeology, had been one of those called on the carpet by Dean Hoskins. He said that he had the questionnaire put to him and that he answered every one of the questions except the third: "Who asked you to sign the petition to the association?" That he refused to answer, in order not to incriminate any one. He said he had not signed the petition, had had no part in The Independent Truth or the "constitution" and that all he had done was to take part in a preliminary meeting of some of the Faculty to talk over the Sprowls discharge.

Yet he was notified of his dismissal. He went to Dean Hoskins and asked for an explanation, and he says that the Dean asked him if he was in accord with the views of the administration. Dr. Radford replied that frankly he thought the students and Faculty should have some share in the government, but that he could reconcile his views with the majority and not press them. He told the Dean of going to the preliminary meeting, and says that Dr. Hoskins asked him, "Don't you realize it was very unwise to hold such a meeting?"

The following day came announcement that Dean Maurice Mulvania also had been notified that he would not be re-engaged for next Fall. Friends of Dr. Mulvania say that he had been "double-crossed"; that his endeavors to reconcile the two factions led Dr. Morgan to let him go, although he was working, as he thought, with the President's approval, to get the concensus of Faculty opinion and help in working out the problem. Dr. Mulvania has had a career of service with the university lasting over many years.

Two or three others, minor instructors, were also discarded. Then President Morgan let it be known that "for the present" no more discharges were contemplated.

Trustees Urged to Act.

The torrent of protest caused the Board of Trustees to announce that at its meeting on July 17 it would go into the discharges and examine their merits. The members, however, were privately understood to feel that there was nothing they could do except to sustain Dean Hoskins and President Morgan. When this impression became generally known it caused the discharged professors' friends, the students and the alumni to demand of Governor Austin Peay of Tennessee, ex-officio Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the university, that he should see that a square deal was given to the decapitated professors.

A committee of alumni called on Governor Peay in July and extracted from him the promise that he would insist that the discharged professors should have a full hearing. He further promised that if the Trustees didn't give it he would see that it was obtained elsewhere.

Petitions urging investigation of the entire situation arrived from students and alumni. These folk began to bring political pressure; to bombard the Governor, the President and the Trustees. The demands became of larger scope. Irate alumni wanted Dean Hoskins's administration of school discipline looked into. They claimed that there would be found the original cause of the trouble. They spoke of an alleged "spy system," of securing information of infraction of rules for student governance. They likewise demanded that it be demonstrated whether the freedom of academic thought had been endangered at the university.

It was also said that the Association of American University Professors had granted the request for the investigation of the Sprowls case, though this announcement was premature. A telegram from Professor Herbert Goodrich, Chairman of the association's Committee on Academic Freedom and Tenure, states that he is taking a vote of the members of the committee as to whether such a probe should be attempted. He says that the members are widely scattered and that it will take some time to learn whether the majority favor the investigation.

Statements that if the outcome of such an investigation should prove unfavorable to the University of Tennessee the association would "blacklist" the university have been set at rest by Professor John Dewey of Columbia University, President of the association, who has sent a message to Knoxville repudiating the recent statement of Dr. Sprowls to that effect.

Politics Play a Part.

Dr. Dewey said that the association "is not an occupational union, which seeks to defend its members by a 'we don't patronize' list." In a recent bulletin of the association, however, such figures as Dr. Dewey, President Lowell of Harvard and other leading educators, in defending the organization's attitude, declare: "It is clearly not proper that university professors should be prohibited from lending their active support to movements believed to be in the public interest. It is neither possible nor desirable to deprive college professors of the political rights vouchsafed to every citizen."

This statement is being used by the insurgents at the university as a counter to the impression which has recently come out that another reason for the discharge of some of the professors is that their political activity displeased the university administration. Judge Neal is active in politics and has twice been a candidate for the Democratic nomination for Governor. Dr. Radford is known to be outspoken in his views on political questions.

As a parting shot, the students of the Law School declared in a body: "We will none of us return this Fall if Dr. Neal is not reinstated."

Partial defeat of the insurgent professors and students resulted from the meeting of the Trustees at Knoxville last Tuesday. The six ousted professors presented their case and lost at every point, so far as their reinstatement was concerned. The Trustees voted unanimously, however, to institute Faculty representation in the administration of the university, and by this they conceded one of the chief points in the conflict.

The day before the meeting brought developments thick and fast. Walter S. Roberts Jr., a sophomore, disclosed that he had been editor-in-chief of the Independent Truth, and that a general subscription from the students had paid for its publication. Dr. Sprowls declared he would not consider reinstatement, as he had taken employment with the University of Idaho for next year.

Governor Peay insisted that the meeting of the Trustees should be public. Several hundred students attended, cheering when the university administration was attacked. The Governor and Bolton Smith of Memphis were the only Trustees voting against the blanket endorsement of the Morgan régime.

Since time immemorial the administrative council has been made up of the President, the deans, and four professors chosen by the President. But the Trustees have now ordered that two of the four professors on the council shall be elected by the Faculty.

FARMERS' GOVERNOR URGES CO-OPERATION

THE farmers of the United States will have much to do with the Presidential election in 1924, and the successful candidate must be a man who has a tangible, definite program for bettering the condition of the farmer."

The "radical" Governor of Colorado, William E. Sweet, who is known throughout the West as the Farmers' Governor, was summing up. He had been discussing Colorado's particular problems and the speeches of President Harding on his Western tour.

"The President has the right notion in general, I believe," Governor Sweet went on, "but he has nothing concrete to offer. One reads his speeches through without gathering anything more conclusive than a general feeling that the President is sympathetic."

When asked what sort of suggestion he would offer for national adoption for bettering the condition of the farmer, Governor Sweet answered without hesitation. "The same sort of action and organization that has been taken by the California fruit growers, by the Kentucky tobacco growers, and the same sort of thing we are now doing our level best to put across in Colorado. A plan for co-operative marketing of farm products, with such storage and regulation as is necessary, is essential."

For many years Governor Sweet was in the bond business in Denver, and because of these connections at the time of his campaign last year he was labeled a "big business man trying to bamboozle the farmers and laboring men into supporting him." His work since he took office has ridiculed any such accusation.

"When the Colorado Federation of Labor wanted to endorse me during the campaign," said the Governor, "some of my advisers told me to refuse to take it. They said that it would kill my chances. But I told them I wanted that endorsement. I took it. And the men in the Colorado Federation of Labor are still among my stanchest supporters, they and the farmers.

Called Farmers' Governor.

"Farmers' Governor? Well, I guess that's about what I am. Down at La Junta last year when I was campaigning I outlined my plans to a group of farmer folk. And when I had finished and started down through the crowd toward the door I heard a farmer's wife talking to her neighbor. I listened. 'He's for me,' she said. That was one of the greatest tributes I could have had paid me. Any one could have said, 'I'm for him,' but for her to say, and mean when she said it, 'He's for me,' meant something to me. And that seems to have been the way farmers all over the State felt about it. Twenty-five thousand votes were cast in Colorado with mine the only name marked on the ballot. Twenty-five thousand people went to the polls and voted for no one else. And most of those votes were from the rural precincts."

Governor Sweet's strong interest in co-operative marketing was aroused three years ago when he attended a meeting of the Twin City Milk Producers' Association, held in Madison, Wis. The Governor was a casual visitor, but when the head of the organization told how conditions among the milk producers had been improved by co-operative marketing and organization Mr. Sweet became interested. Here was something that looked like a solution for the farmers' problems in Colorado.

"I saw that so long as those milk producers were disorganized they were at the mercy of the distributers of their milk," he said. "They took the prices they were offered. And they got merely enough to keep body and soul together. But when they organized, then they began getting what they earned. They told the distributers what they had to have in order to live decently, and they got it.

Gov. William E. Sweet.

"I came back to Colorado resolved to see what I could do to aid the farmers by this new method. And I began studying the farmers' problems from a business man's standpoint." The Governor smiled as he went on: "I don't know much about the technical end of farming, but I think that so far as study of conditions and problems can make one, I am acquainted with the farmers' needs. And I have a program for the farmer that seems to be working."

New Legislation Needed.

In his inaugural address, delivered last January, Governor Sweet said in part: "Both State and nation are under obligations to place the business of farming on a sound basis. The national Government now has under consideration special legislation for the relief of the farmer. Our own State must proceed immediately to pass such laws as not only will permit, but promote, co-operative marketing among farmers and stock growers.

"A successful plan of co-operative marketing necessitates the establishment of a Bureau of Markets with a Market Director, whose duty it shall be to give counsel and leadership in the organization of co-operative marketing associations as well as to assist in the orderly marketing of farm produce and livestock. I cannot stress too strongly the importance of dealing promptly and constructively with the farmers' problem. I am sure that a new Co-operative Marketing law based on the present-day practices would result in a great good to all the people of the State."

Both these suggestions have been followed. A bill was passed legalizing the organization and functioning of co-operative marketing associations, and another bill providing for the establishment of a State Bureau of Markets and a State Market Director.

"When a bank in New York has money it wants to lend on the exchange, that bank calls its broker and tells it that it has, say, $5,000,000 at 4½ per cent," he added. "The money is offered as $5,000,000 at 4½ per cent., not as money from one bank or another. Those bankers get together every morning and have an understanding as to what they must have for their money. And if a man who wants to borrow it offers only 3½ per cent. he does not get it.

"A Denver merchant when he sells a suit of clothes first figures out what his overhead is, how much his clerks cost, how much his lights, rent, fuel, insurance and interest cost him. Then he figures the percentage of that load each suit must carry. He sets his price so the suit carries the load and gives him a small profit. And he sells the suit for that price, or he goes broke.

"That's what farmers must do. They must get together, find out what it costs to produce, to live decently and to put their crops on the market. Then they must demand that price."

CRIMINAL CURE BY THE "CAT."

SPAIN first adopted the "garrote" for the execution of criminals. This was a collar compressed by a screw, which caused death by piercing the spinal marrow. In London some years ago footpads pursued a somewhat similar method, one nearly suffocating the victim while the other ransacked his pockets. The popularity of this form of criminality was obliterated by the infliction of the "cat" upon all rogues proved to have become garroters.

Recently at the Old Bailey, which court exercises jurisdiction over from seven to eight million people, the Recorder, Sir Ernest Wild, K. C., entertained a number of American lawyers, and, in the course of his speech, he expressed regret that in England there was such prevalence of crimes of violence, which might be the aftermath of the war.

The crime of robbery with violence, he added, had been greatly reduced during the past year by the infliction of the "cat" in proper cases. Certain ruffians, with no respect for age or sex, who committed these crimes, could only be fittingly punished in this way. He had no doubt if the "cat" could be inflicted for armed burglary the same happy result would follow.

GASOLINE MOTOR TAX FOR ROADS SPREADING OVER THE COUNTRY

Adoption by Seventeen States This Year Increases Total to Thirty-six Having the Law—Widely Favored Provided Other Automobile Taxes Are Equalized

By JAMES P. TAYLOR,
Secretary Vermont State Chamber of Commerce.

THIRTY-SIX of the forty-eight States in the Union have adopted a gasoline tax for motor vehicle use. The results of the present year's legislation enacted the law in seventeen new States. The tax is now operative or will be before the close of the year in thirty-five States. The California 2-cent tax will go into effect Sept. 1. The legislation for the tax adopted in Massachusetts is subject to a referendum vote in November provided the required 15,000 signatures applying for the referendum are obtained. In response to a telegram of inquiry on July 14, J. W. Bowman of the Used Car Statistical Bureau wired as follows: "Do not expect our full returns on signatures for thirty days, but they are coming in now very satisfactorily."

The heaviest tax per gallon, 3 cents, is required in six States—Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, Oregon, Virginia. The last named is a newcomer. In the other five the tax has been increased, Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina formerly having a 1-cent rate, while 2 cents was the former South Carolina and Oregon tax. Utah charges 2½ cents. In Maryland, Delaware, New Hampshire and Washington the existing 1-cent tax will be increased to 2 cents after Jan. 1, 1924.

The seventeen new States which adopted gasoline tax legislation this year for the first time are, with the amount of the tax:

State.	Tax.
Alabama	2c
California	2c
Delaware	1c., 1924 2c
Idaho	2c
Indiana	2c
Maine	1c
Massachusetts	2c
Nevada	2c
New Hampshire	1c., 1924 2c
Oklahoma	1c
Tennessee	2c
Texas	1c
Utah	2½c
Vermont	1c
Virginia	3c
West Virginia	2c
Wyoming	1c

The accompanying map shows the amount of the tax in all of the States where the act is in force. The States increasing their rates this year are, in addition to the five making the tax 3 cents, Colorado, Montana, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and Washington, all of which raised the tax from 1 to 2 cents.

The Governors of Iowa, Michigan and Wisconsin vetoed gasoline tax bills passed by Legislatures by good margins. The Michigan bill was passed by the vote in the Senate of 40 to 11 and in the House by 70 to 18, and the Wisconsin bill was passed in the Senate by 21 to 6 and in the House by 70 to 15.

So general has the movement grown for gasoline taxation that in only two States has there been no legislative interest this year—Illinois and Rhode Island. Rhode Island is the only State in which a gasoline tax bill has never been introduced. A bill was lost in the Illinois Legislature in 1921. Minnesota has passed a law to submit to the people a constitutional amendment which will make it possible to use the income from a gasoline tax for the highway system. If adopted the tax will become operative there in 1925.

Although this year there has been no duplication of the Louisiana vote in 1921 for a gasoline tax of 1 cent which was passed unanimously by both the Senate and the House, unanimous votes are far from being unknown this year among the new States, for the gasoline tax votes in the Senates of both Delaware and Utah were unanimous. Highway departments in Texas and Tennessee report the legislative votes as "almost unanimous." The big votes were due to the earnest conviction that the gasoline tax is a logical and equitable method to use in connection with the problems of financing the State road systems.

Tax Slogan, For Roads Only.

One thing evidently seems absolutely sure in the minds of the people of the new States, and that is that the income from the tax should be used for roads only. And the exceptions, Texas and Alabama, prove the rule.

In Texas one of the first propositions presented was that 100 per cent. of the tax income should be given to the school fund. This was changed in later bills to 50 per cent. for the school fund. But the final bill provided that 75 per cent. should go to the State highway fund and that 25 per cent. should go to the school fund, as the Constitution of Texas requires that 25 per cent. of all occupation or special taxes shall be paid to that fund.

The Alabama law provides that 50 per cent. of the tax shall go to the State general fund and 50 per cent. to the counties for the construction and maintenance of roads. The Alabama public is understood to be in favor of devoting 100 per cent. of the income tax to road work, and it is expected that a bill amending the law will be presented to the Legislature.

Another significant fact is the protest against certain features of the new Three-Cent bill in an old State, Florida, which formerly had a 1-cent tax for road purposes. Two cents of the new tax goes to the State Road Department "to pay for the construction and maintenance of State roads." The language of the bill does not define the use of the other 1 cent of the tax which "shall be equally divided between the counties of the State of Florida." This implies that it may be used for any county purpose and considerable opposition has been aroused.

Recognition of this "all for roads" principle, which for various reasons was impracticable at first in some of the nineteen old States, has been made this year in nearly all of them.

In Connecticut the gasoline tax law was amended this session so that the 1 cent per gallon tax is to go to the highway fund rather than, as formerly, to the State general fund.

The Georgia Legislature is considering a bill which provides that the tax shall be 2 cents rather than 1 cent and that the income shall be devoted to highway construction.

Pennsylvania now devotes to roads 25 per cent. of the 2-cent gasoline tax, which, through an emergency State tax, is an increase over the former tax of 1 cent, all of which went to the State general fund.

North Dakota is now the only State in which all the income from the gasoline tax goes to the general fund.

Distinctive Law Features.

While the proceeds of the gasoline tax are dedicated in general to the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges in the State highway system and, in some cases, in part to county and town roads, there are distinctive features in the laws of Vermont, Delaware, Utah and West Virginia.

The Vermont law provides for the setting apart of the income as a separate fund to be called the "Surface Fund," and directs that the money be expended by the State Highway Board "in laying the dust on and resurfacing the main thoroughfares and State roads."

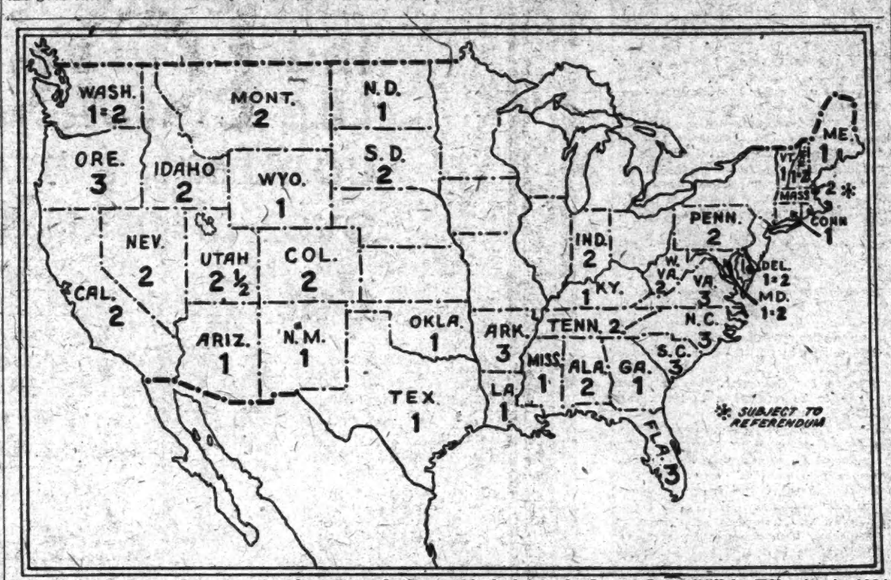
The Utah law provides that any balance left after payment of interest and sinking fund charges on State road bonds shall be deposited to the credit of the State Highway and Maintenance Fund.

The Delaware law provides that all income shall be used for bonds to be issued for the construction and maintenance of State roads.

The West Virginia law, with an emphatic "only," states that the funds shall be used "only for the purpose of the reconstruction, maintenance and repair of roads and highways, and for the payment of the interest on State bonds issued for road purposes."

In Indiana, as in Massachusetts, the measure was an Administration measure, and Governor McCray recently sent his Attorney General to represent the State in the test case on the constitutionality of the bill.

Running the gauntlet of the courts in Indiana and Texas, and, possibly, the gauntlet of the people through a referendum in Massachusetts, will not be an unfortunate experience for the law, since it will mean a clearer definition of the principles involved and a popular study of what the law means to the motor fraternity and to the good roads movement.



Map Showing States Imposing Gasoline Tax. In Those Marked 1-2, the Latter Price Will be Effective in 1924.

There is also another tribute to the character of the gasoline tax as most logical and most equitable in the growing conviction that a larger proportion of the tax burden borne by the automobile should be measured out to the user of the roads by the method of the gasoline tax, which meters the service received by each individual. This has an example in California, which adopts the tax largely "in lieu of" other taxes.

With the gas tax and the weight tax the motorist can feel that in his own State he is playing his part in the support of the good roads which he has been demanding for many years, and that, when he is traveling in other States, he is making some contribution to the road use. This is the philosophy that lies behind the adoption in California of the "in lieu of" principle, for California adopts a 2 cents gasoline tax and a nominal license fee. Figuring that the two-year income from the tax will be $37,000,000 the legislators feel that they have no need of a license fee based on weight, and accordingly make the uniform license fee of $3 a car.

It is the "in lieu of" principle that may bring into the gasoline tax list another Eastern State, New Jersey, as suggested in a letter from the Commissioner of Motor Vehicles, W. L. Dill, of New Jersey, saying:

"I believe that the public are ready to accept a form of taxation for automobiles premised on the frequency with which the various types of vehicles use the roads, and that it will not be a difficult matter to obtain almost unanimous support for a gas tax measure, provided it can be shown that as the result of such a tax there is likelihood of the registration fees for motor vehicles either being reduced or wiped out in their entirety."

The following letter shows the reaction of Highway Commissioner Frederick Stuart of New York State, which has not yet adopted the tax. He wrote the Vermont State Chamber of Commerce on April 30 as follows:

"One glance at the map you sent me would convince anyone that a gasoline tax is sweeping over the country. It is, to my notion, the only fair way to tax automobile owners; for it makes a man pay for the actual use he gets out of the road."

Gradually the people of the country are coming to think together and to think alike about the gasoline tax as one of the essentials in the solution of the highway problems of the States.

As involving a national policy to be adopted by State units, the gasoline tax movement has certainly more than doubled its momentum during the last few months through increasing uniformity of thought and action, and this process of attaining essentially uniform procedure everywhere will evidently continue for several years.

AUTO ROUTE GUIDE.

A HANDY booklet for the touring motorist known as Grant's Sectional Auto Route Maps and Guide has just been published by G. P. Putnam's Sons. It contains forty-one road maps, each covering from 100 to 300 miles, showing types of roads and main route markings. There are also fifty-one city maps.

ARGENTINE JURIST ASKS FOR ELASTICITY IN LAWS

Dr. E. S. Zeballos, Who Comes to Lecture at Williamstown, Is a World Authority on Conflicts in National Statutes—Formerly Minister at Washington.

THE visit to this country of Dr. Estanislao S. Zeballos of Argentina to deliver a series of addresses at the Institute of Politics at Williamstown, synchronizes with the recent notable achievement at Boyle's Thirty Acres of another son of the great southern republic. Perhaps it will serve to dispel any notion prevalent here that the high rank of Argentina among the nations is derived solely from the progress of her gladiators.

Argentina's progress rests on free political institutions tenaciously adhered to; on wise legislation based on the principles of liberty embodied in the American Constitution, and on the patriotic service of a long succession of statesmen, of whom Dr. Zeballos is the most striking surviving figure.

Twice Argentine Minister at Washington; three times Minister of Foreign Affairs of his own country; for many years Professor of International Law at the University of Buenos Aires; a permanent member of The Hague Tribunal, and a prolific writer on the subject of the conflict of laws, Dr. Zeballos will be no stranger to the distinguished assemblage of public men from every quarter of the globe who will gather at Williamstown this month to discuss world affairs.

Many other notables of his country are known here. Among them are Dr. Luis M. Drago, the author of the famous South American Doctrine, finally adopted by the United States and the great powers of Europe at the Second International Peace Conference at The Hague in 1907; Dr. Vicente Quesada, whose book "Recollections of My Diplomatic Life," is a literary gem; and Dr. Martin Garcia Merou, author of the "History of American Diplomacy" which is treated as a text book in all the chancelleries of the world.

A Liberal Legalist.

Dr. Zeballos has chiefly devoted his attention to the development of Private international law (conflict of laws) both at home and abroad. It is largely due to his labors in this branch of legal science that the Argentine courts have been brought to regard human rights as paramount to strictly legal interpretations, and to impose silence on the provisions of national laws in the instance of aliens where the foreign law may be reasonably and benevolently applied.

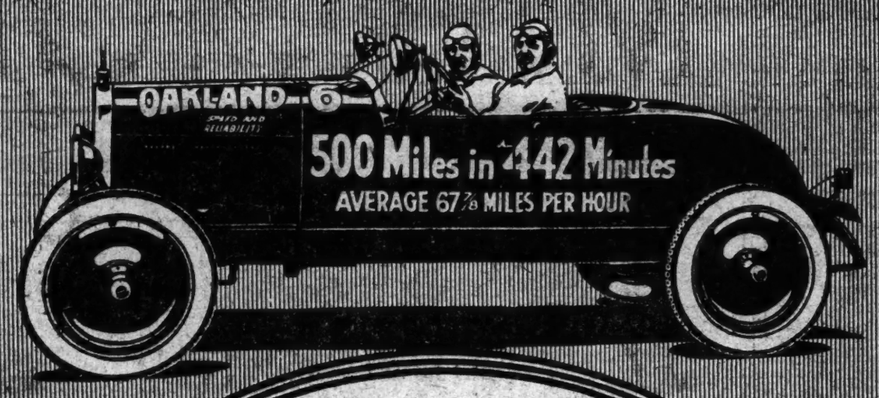
In his work on "Nationality," translated into several languages, Dr. Zeballos cites numerous cases in which the Argentine Supreme Court has adopted that principle. Thus, it has frequently happened that the Argentine courts have recognized the legal majority of a person of 21 years of age, according to the law of his own country, while the national laws fix 22 years as the minimum age at which a citizen may exercise his full civil rights. Even in the case of mixed marriages whose effects in private international law often lead to a conflict of distinct systems of jurisprudence, the tribunals of the republic have never denied them due legal protection when legitimately contracted and celebrated either by nationals or foreigners.

The same theory is carried into practice, where possible, in cases relating to citizenship, wills, divorces, legitimacy, domicile, bankruptcy, jurisdiction, naturalization and a number of other kindred matters arising out of a conflict of laws; and it is in great measure due to the advocacy of Dr. Zeballos that this broad conception of private international law has brought about what Argentine lawyers proudly describe as their "supernational law."

Laws Tempered to Aliens.

Like the United States the Argentine Republic has a population largely composed of persons of foreign birth or origin, and is consequently a vast field for the exercise of generous interpretations of private international law when its literal definition would ordinarily prejudice the moral and material interests of many of her citizens. Experience has confirmed the advantages of that system of reconciling human and legal rights without departing from the established principles, as distinguished from the conflicting interpretations of international law; but its gradual perfection is being chiefly attained by the wide teaching of private international law as part of the curricula of most of the colleges and universities of the country.

Nor is it alone in this branch of law that Argentina excels. Since 1860, when Calvo published his translation with annotations of Story's "Commentaries on the Federal Constitution of the United States," the study of constitutional law has been an important feature in the training of national law students as well as a source of attractive reading to others of the intellectual classes. It is indeed safe to say that in Buenos Aires, with a population one-third of that of New York City, there are more people who know the history and achievements of Joseph Story, of John Marshall, and of Alexander Hamilton than are to be found in this metropolis.



An Oakland Six on June 3rd, raced around the famous Cotati Speedway, near San Francisco, California, for 500 continuous miles in 442 consecutive minutes!

Terrific Pace Proves Oakland's Stamina and Endurance

Traveling at the record-breaking speed of 67.7 miles per hour—an Oakland Six again demonstrated its wonderful stamina and endurance! Such a gruelling pace is more than a test of speed! It proves that the Oakland chassis is so sturdily built that it can withstand tremendous speeds continuously for nearly eight hours—without injurious effect—without strain—without breaking.

The cylinders, crankshaft, bearings, transmission, differential—every single part of this record-breaking Oakland Six was exactly like those in the thousands of Oaklands in the quiet, everyday service of owners everywhere.

Coupled with Oakland's recent winning, for the second consecutive time, of the Yosemite Valley Run—the nation's leading Economy Contest—this newest feat offers added evidence that Oakland is building "the finest light six."

See the splendid Oakland Six today! Let us tell you how easily you can acquire one on Oakland's Special Payment Plan.

$2850 f. o. b. Syracuse

Keeping pace with the demand for this new Sedan has been a difficult task ever since it was first shown—even with production more than doubled.

The Franklin Sedan gives people the finest ride they ever had. That, in short, is the story of its unequalled road ability and accounts for its great popularity. It is without a closed car rival in comfort, easy handling and making time.

Many Franklin owners are among those who have been unable to get this new car because of the over-demand. During July, Franklin's Twenty-first Sales Anniversary, we will make special effort to take care of their requirements.

RADIO

COURT SETTLES PATENT CASE

THE decree by the United States District Court of New Jersey, in the case between the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, plaintiff, and the Radio Craft, Inc., and the De Forest Radio Telephone and Telegraph Company, defendants, disclosed some interesting facts relative to the patent issued Edwin H. Armstrong in connection with the regenerative circuit.

Armstrong, after obtaining his patent on Oct. 6, 1914, granted seventeen limited licenses to various persons and corporations. He assigned the patent to the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, in November, 1920. Important points in the license agreements were that the license was nontransferable and that it was a license to manufacture and sell apparatus to radio amateurs for use in amateur radio stations, radio experimenters, scientific schools and universities.

The Court held that the radio company had no existence separate from the De Forest Company, except one of form. The Radio Company had one of the licenses granted by Armstrong, but this license could not be transferred to the De Forest Company. The business activity of the Radio Company with respect to subject matter of the patent was the business activity of the De Forest Company. The decree was in favor of the plaintiff.

It was shown before the Court that the De Forest Company had sold radio materials to the Cutting and Washington Company, a limited licensee under the Armstrong patent, and the latter concern assembled the regenerative receivers and sold them to the De Forest Company, which retailed them as regenerative sets. On another occasion the De Forest Company employed in the construction of certain sets a variometer made by the Chicago Radio Laboratories, a limited licensee. This instrument bore the inscription "Licensed for use under Armstrong patent 1113149." The Court held that to incorporate a single piece of licensed apparatus into a set to make it regenerative constituted an infringement, because the patent applies to a circuit and not to an instrument.

A number of manufacturers have been making non-regenerative sets, but providing them with binding posts for the addition of a coil or short wire connection, which make the set regenerative. The decree states that a non-regenerative set so adapted is an infringement on the Armstrong patent. The alteration of non-regenerative sets made by others into regenerative sets and the sale of such apparatus also is considered an infringement by the Court.

A regenerative circuit produces much louder signals and covers a greater distance than the non-regenerative type of receiver. The regenerative circuit, known as the Armstrong circuit, consists of a vacuum tube so connected that after detection the signal introduced in the plate circuit is led back to the grid circuit. This increases the original energy received by the grid.

Armstrong Discovers Feedback.

Armstrong, while a student at Columbia University, had an amateur wireless station at his home in Yonkers. There he made observations which led him to suspect that radio frequency oscillations might be carried over into the plate circuit with some improvements in the detecting action of the tube. He tuned the plate circuit to radio frequency by inserting an inductance and capacity in the plate circuit, making it responsive to radio frequency waves. He not only found that radio frequency waves could be carried over into the plate circuit, but that they could be amplified by the energy delivered from the B battery without change of frequency or wave form, and that they could be fed into the grid circuit, where they increased the potential variation on the grid. The operation continuously repeated itself. This was the feedback regeneration, which increased the sensitiveness of the vacuum tube and strength of signals. It was in this way that Armstrong thought out the invention.

He erected his first amateur wireless station in 1906. His first vacuum tube detector was a Fleming valve which consisted of a filament and plate. This was in 1908. Two years later he obtained a three-element vacuum tube detector, a De Forest audion, which contained a filament, plate and grid.

Like the majority of radio enthusiasts, he tried various hook-ups to improve the range of his station and strength of signals. In the Fall of 1913 the idea occurred to him to tune the plate circuit with a coil. This he did, and he picked up press signals from Cape Cod louder than ever before, and messages from all of the Atlantic Coast stations and Clifden, Ireland. By February, 1913, he had learned to understand the phenomenon of the feedback action.

He asked his father and an uncle for financial aid to secure a patent, but both refused. Realizing the importance of the invention, he made drawings and had them witnessed before a notary, and thereby made a record of his discovery the best he could under the circumstances. On Oct. 29, 1913, he filed a patent to cover the feedback regenerative circuit, and it was granted on Oct. 6, 1914.

Several other inventors have offered evidence by which they have attempted to show that they first conceived the regenerative circuit prior to Armstrong, but the courts have sustained and protected Armstrong in all cases.

Leonard-Tendler Fight Through WJZ.

WJZ's microphone will be on duty at the ringside in the Yankee Stadium tomorrow evening to pick up the radio observer's blow-for-blow description of the Leonard-Tendler fight. The preliminary bouts will begin to enter the ether at 8:30 P. M. and the main fight at 10 P. M. Major J. Andrew White will describe the contest.

Other events scheduled to be broadcast by WJZ during the week consist of a United States Navy program, Tuesday at 9:15 P. M.; the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Wednesday at 8:30 P. M., and at 9:30 o'clock the dinner in honor of Hiram Johnson will be radiated from the ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria. An organ recital is on the program for Thursday, 8 P. M., and at 9:50 P. M. Mayor Hylan's People's Concert will be broadcast. The band playing in Central Park will entertain Friday from 8:15 to 10 P. M. The New York Philharmonic Orchestra will give a concert Saturday at 8:30 P. M. Arlington time signals will be retransmitted by WJZ daily at 10:55 P. M.

Arlington Has New Tube Set.

The Fessenden 100-kilowatt spark set at Station NAA, Arlington, Va., which has broadcast time signals, weather forecasts and Government reports since December, 1912, has been replaced with a vacuum tube transmitter. The new equipment operates on the same wave length, 2,650 meters.

Time signals from the old spark set were copied by vessels in the Mediterranean, and amateur stations as far south as Brazil have set their watches by the ticks of NAA. Arlington was the first United States naval station to pick up FL, Eiffel Tower, on Dec. 23, 1913, and in 1913 direct two-way communication was established between the Paris station and Washington.

NAA's aerial is held aloft by three towers, two of which are 450 feet high and the third 600 feet. The highest tower is sufficiently rugged to withstand a weight of 10,000 pounds pressure at the top. More recent towers of Government radio stations are designed to withstand a strain of 20,000 pounds at the top.

The Bureau of Aeronautics of the Navy Department has used the highest tower as the perch for wind recording instruments.

Radio Frequency Indicator.

One of the resolutions adopted by the Second Radio Conference, held in Washington in March, stated that all broadcasting stations should be equipped with an indicating instrument for the purpose of maintaining the operating wave frequency within two kilocycles of the assigned wave frequency.

The Bureau of Standards has designed a radio frequency indicator to meet the need. Specifications for its construction may be secured by any broadcasting station upon request. The instrument consists of a seventy-two turn space-wound coil on a 3½-inch tube, a variable condenser and a sensitive thermo-galvanometer. The entire elements are connected in series. The condenser is provided with a locking device, so that it may be locked or soldered in position after the instrument is adjusted to indicate the required frequency. It may be set to indicate the radio frequency in range from 222 meters to 545 meters. If indicators are constructed by the broadcasting stations according to the Bureau of Standards specifications and are sent to the bureau's radio laboratory they will be adjusted at a nominal fee, to operate at the frequency of the station.

Stations Total 573.

Radiophone broadcasting started in September, 1921, with three stations. There were 591 stations operating in May, establishing a record for the number of stations licensed. At the end of June there were 573 stations, eighteen having withdrawn from the air since May. Fifty stations were deleted in June, but new ones prevented the number from going below 573.

Class A stations total 203; Class B, 42; Class C, 327; Class D, 1.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Question—What is a polarity indicator?—G. J. D. Answer—A polarity indicator is an instrument which indicates the positive and negative terminals of a battery.

Question—What is the easiest way to tell the positive from the negative binding post of a storage battery?—P. E. Answer—If a polarity indicator is not handy the polarity may be determined by placing the wires from the terminals of the battery in a glass of salt water. The wires should not be too close together. Bubbles will gather at the negative wire under the surface of the water.

Question—How can I adjust a pencil mark grid leak?—J. F. Answer—To increase the resistance rub off some of the pencil line with an eraser; to decrease the resistance make more lines. The adjustment should be made while the set is in operation. Increase and decrease the resistance until the signals are loudest.

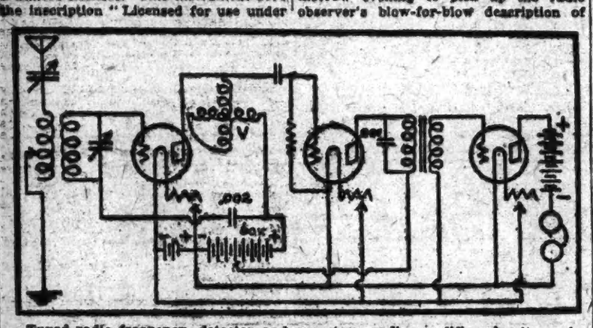
Question—Will a UV-199 stand 90 volts on the plate without burning out? (2) If three dry cells are used with the UV-199 how many ohms should the rheostats have if three tubes are used?—P. W. Answer—Yes, but not more than 45 volts should be employed when it is used as a detector. (2) Ten ohms each.

Question—Can the WD-11 be used as an amplifier as well as a detector? (2) What is the difference between a WD-11 and a WD-12?—M. C. Answer—Yes. (2) The electrical characteristics are the same. The WD-12 is provided with a base which fits in the standard socket. The WD-11 requires an adapter to fit the standard socket.

Question—What is meant by a split variometer?—T. K. Answer—The rotor and stator windings are not connected with each other.

Question—How many volts can be used in the plate circuit when a Federal No. 65 transformer is used?—G. F. Answer—Eighty volts.

Question—I notice when I put a fixed condenser across the primary of the first amplifying transformer the signals came in louder. Would a fixed condenser across the secondary of the transformer give still louder signals? (2) Should the second amplifying transformer have condensers around it?—R. E. Answer—No. The fixed condenser across the primary is used to serve as a by-pass across the transformer for the high frequency radio currents and the detector tube oscillates more readily. (2) No.



Tuned radio frequency, detector and one stage audio amplifier circuit; variocoupler used as tuner; "V" is a standard variometer; variable condensers .0005 mfd; grid leak one megohm; grid condenser .00025 mfd; audio amplifying transformer ratio 5 to 1; amplifier "B" battery 45 volts.

BOY SCOUTS

CAMP is still the main topic of conversation among the scouts of Greater New York. The boys who have been there insist on telling what they have done, and those who are still to go declaim grandly on what they are going to do. The camp registration this year is much greater than it has ever been before. Monday found the usual excitement among the boys who were to go to camp, and every one was aboard the boat that was to take them to Bear Mountain long before the final whistle blew to cast off. On Monday, July 16, 447 boys let out a mighty cheer when the boat moved away from the pier, and by nightfall they were all safely in camp. Manhattan sent 170, Queens 90, the Bronx 56 and Brooklyn 125.

Manhattan Council seems to be setting the pace in hiking along the White Bar Trail. Leo Wilson is at present making a several days' trip along the trail with some thirty scouts, and Mr. Neas is making periodical journeys with small groups.

The annual circus of the Manhattan boys was run off a short time ago, said to have been the "biggest and the best on earth." There was enough "pink lemonade" to make every one just as sick as he desired to be, while some of the antics which were a part of the performance made many boys wonder why their sides ached the next day—it still hurt them to laugh. The costumes were more numerous and gawdy than the ones last year and they were all so perfect that the contest for the best costume was called off, because no one could decide definitely which was best. Combined with the circus were water sports and exhibitions.

Queens camps are feeling exceedingly proud ever since the recent day when General Pershing visited Camp Mattinecock on his tour of inspection and complimented them on their spick and span appearance. General Pershing spent forty minutes in camp and this is what he said:

"The work you are doing should appeal to every citizen. It would be an education to many men to have the opportunity to inspect Boy Scout camps and to witness the work being done in them.

"You are to be congratulated and to be complimented upon what you are accomplishing. I consider the Boy Scout movement one of the great movements in America, today.

"I would not introduce military discipline into the Boy Scout movement if I could. I believe the work you are doing is perhaps more broadening than that which would be given under a military régime. In any event, you are teaching boys the right thing—to be good citizens. And any man who is a good citizen will make a good soldier in time of peril."

Open War on Caterpillars.

The Boy Scouts of Watertown, N. Y., did effective work in helping to exterminate the tent caterpillars from the county. Large cloth torches well soaked in kerosene were used by the Scouts. What is believed to be the record is held by four Scouts who covered four miles of territory. The boys succeeded in destroying 475 nests of the caterpillars and are planning on destroying as many more. Another Scout destroyed seventy-eight nests by himself, while other Scouts chalked a good many to their credit. The boys had no difficulty in finding plenty of nests along the roadside and expect to continue their good work with the aid of the members of the Automobile Club.

National Court of Honor Awards.

The National Court of Honor has acted upon and sent out medals or certificates of commendation to Scouts throughout the United States for saving life as follows:

Honor Medal—Scout Earl Wallis, College Park, Ga.; Scout Billy Migelle, College Park, Ga.; Scout Joseph Kaler, Oakland, Cal.

The gold honor medal is the only award of the Boy Scouts of America in recognition of unusual heroism displayed by a duly registered Scout in the actual saving of life at the risk of his own.

Co-operation With National Aeronautic Association.

The National Council, Boy Scouts of America, has accepted in principle co-operative plans suggested by the National Aeronautic Association, the Post Office Department, and the War and Navy Departments, regarding the establishment of airplane landing fields throughout the United States and a plan of instruction which will be provided so that Scouts may be of assistance in case of accidents and in giving assistance to pilots. The details of the plan are to be worked out immediately.

Dawson Troop Commended by President.

The Dawson troop of Boy Scouts has just received from President Harding a letter of congratulation for efficient Scout work. A threatening forest fire called out coal mine officials and scores of miners for fire fighting, and owing to the danger the men had to start work without food or water. Thirty minutes after the first alarm the Scouts were on the scene with water, first aid supplies and additional tools. Under perfect discipline they circled the flames, climbed the steep mountain and supplied the fire fighters with water and tools as needed. The fire was brought under control after half a day of work. During the whole time the Scouts aided.

The Livingston, Mont., Scouts have just been given for their use a man's home. It is a miner's cabin—his home—and all he holds most dear are confined within the four walls of that little cabin. This expression of confidence was given all the Scouts of Livingston because one Scout, a local boy, was courageous and kind to him when sickness rendered him helpless and he needed a ministering hand. Continued illness has compelled this man to leave Livingston for an indefinite time.

***

Fire by Friction Record.

The fire by friction record held by Scout James Walker, Troop 11, of Waterbury, Conn., of 11 seconds, was broken recently by Scout Dudley Smith of Independence, Mo., who built the fire in 9 1-5 seconds. Scout Smith also holds the flint and steel record of 4 2-5 seconds.

Philadelphia Scouts Open Camp Biddle.

Camp Herbert M. Biddle, Summer training and vacation grounds for Philadelphia Boy Scouts, was officially opened and dedicated with the unveiling of a bronze tablet at the camp headquarters in the memory of Herbert M. Biddle, the first Scout of Philadelphia to give his life in the service of his country in the World War. Biddle, who was one of the earliest Scouts in Philadelphia, was a member of Troop 46 of the Temple Lutheran Church. He was on the United States ship Cherokee and went down with the vessel when it sank in the lower Delaware River. Camp Biddle is situated along Darby Creek on the 175-acre estate of George H. Earle Jr., who has turned over the property to the Boy Scouts. The camp will accommodate 250 troops during the season.

Lincoln Gives 170 Hours' Work.

Some idea of the work that Boy Scouts accomplished during the early part of June may be had from the report of the Scout Executive who mentions that the boys put in a total of 170 working hours during the completion of the marking of parking lines for the streets of the business section of Lincoln, Ill.

Distribute Fly Swatters.

Supplementing the appeal of the local Board of Health, the Fayette County, Pa., Tuberculosis Society, assisted by the Boy Scouts, will distribute in Uniontown and other parts of the county 20,000 fly swatters. This distribution of swatters has been made possible by the generosity of local business houses.

"Day Off for Mother and Dad."

Scout Mothers and Dads of Milwaukee had a day off during the recent local Good Turn Week when one day was set aside for "Good Turns in the Home." On the list of Good Turns for the occasion were cleaning up the basement, attic, spare room, garage, digging dandelions, mowing lawns, weeding gardens, painting and putting up screen doors, washing windows, taking care of the younger children, tidying up the yard, washing dishes, running errands, polishing silverware, woodwork and furniture, chopping firewood, scrubbing floors and washing the auto. One-star Good Turn, albeit somewhat elaborate in scope, was that of a Scout who sent his mother to the movies at his expense, in the afternoon, while he stayed home to care for the children and get supper.

***

Outdoor Meetings Popular.

The custom of Troop 418, of St. George's Church of Manhattan, of having their meetings out of doors is beginning to find favor among the other Scoutmasters of Manhattan, especially since the coming of hot days. Scoutmaster W. K. Belknap takes his boys up to Van Cortlandt Park each week, where they cook their supper and lie around for a time before the meeting is called to order. After the meeting they hike back to the city.

***

Florida's Scouts Score.

From the Palm Beach (Fla.) High School comes a timely illustration of how boys, through scouting, are prepared to accept leadership responsibilities.

In the past term the presidents of all classes, with the exception of the sophomore, the vice presidents of all four classes, treasurers of three, and one secretary, were Scouts. Four officials of the Athletic Association, as well as the captains of the football, basketball and swimming teams, were members of the organization. Fourteen letter men, six basketball players, five members of the track team, six from the swimming team, one-half of the tennis players and two basketball men were from scouting ranks. Seven Scouts were represented in newspaper work and the highest scholastic record of the year, that of 96¼ per cent., was made by former Assistant Scoutmaster Carl Widell.

Albany Lad Makes Brave Rescue.

An example of grit and heroism recently recorded in the Albany, N. Y., Council, was the recent rescue by 15-year-old Assistant Scoutmaster George Sparks of Worthington Cassole, who was drowning in Kinderhook Lake.

Cassole had rowed his boat nearly to the middle of the lake and had started to dive. Upon striking the water he lost control of his limbs and feeling himself sinking, started to paddle frantically toward the boat, calling for help. A light wind had at this moment veered the boat beyond the reach of the drowning man. His frantic cries for help were heard by a resident of one of the lake cottages and also by Scout Sparks, who was on the shore about a quarter of a mile from the scene of the accident. The cottage owner promptly started out in a boat, shouting to the man to keep his head above the water. The Scout had already started running toward the shore from the woods where he was tramping, undressing as he ran. Reaching the shore, the Scout in spite of his hard run, dove into the lake without a moment's loss of time and began thrashing his way to the drowning man. At nearly the same time that the other rescuer arrived with his boat the Scout reached Cassole, who was weakening and going down time and again. Between the carsman and Sparks the half-drowned man was placed in the boat and taken to shore where first-aid treatment was successfully applied.

Millrace Gets 4-Year-Old.

Scout Edwin Smith of Fulton, N. Y., kept secret the story of his recent heroic rescue of 5-year-old William Diffen from drowning in a millrace, but his brother Scouts were not so reticent.

In the swiftly flowing raceway behind a local manufacturing plant young Smith and a group of companions were enjoying a plunge when they were joined by the Diffen lad, who insisted that he knew how to swim. The older boys, somewhat dubious, had the little fellow tie a rope around himself and fasten it to a tree on the bank.

The boys had just gone to shore for a little rest; the Diffen lad was still moving about in the water. He had gotten half way across the race when the rope in some way became unfastened and the child, evidently becoming frightened, began to sink. The Scout saw the boy as he was going down the third time, dove into the water, reached the drowning lad, grappled with him as scoutcraft teaches, and soon had him safely on shore.

A Scout's Prayer.

"Teach me, dear Lord, to be a Scout
Who loves the open air,
When I go to the home of bird and beast
May I find contentment there.
Help me to find the Trail of Life,
And follow straight and true,
When the day is done, may the sinking sun
Remind me, Lord, of You.
And when the campfire's lost its glow
And the stars are clear and bright,
May Thy Heavenly Love from up above

Week's Best Good Turn.

Courage and presence of mind were conspicuously displayed by two Boy Scouts of Syracuse, N. Y., recently.

At the risk of their lives, Scouts Maurice Shanahan and Irving Seltzer of Syracuse, together with Arthur A. Mullett saved a bedridden invalid from being burned to death when a fire broke out in the building in which her apartment was located. The boys in passing were attracted by smoke. Calling a man who was working near by, the three made their way into the burning building. The flames drove them back when they reached the second landing. But they continued on to the third floor, finally reaching the patient as the flames were licking the posts of the bed on which she was lying helpless. Mullett picked up the woman and managed to carry her as far as the second floor, where Seltzer and Shanahan joined him. The three boys succeeded in getting the invalid safely out of the building.

100,000 Miles

As far as we know the maximum life of a Marmon has never been determined. We simply know that thousands of Marmons are giving excellent service after 100,000 miles, seldom with more than one overhauling.

"My Marmon"

"I have had the pleasure of driving a Marmon over 130,000 miles. I know mighty little about the mechanism of the car as I have spent the time enjoying the driving of it."—Prescot T. Stevens, Los Angeles, Cal.

Want to Keep Your Hair Perpetually Curly?

Perpetually wavy or curly hair is now within the means of every woman to possess. One need only get a few ounces of plain liquid silmerine from the druggist and apply a little of it occasionally with a brush before doing up the hair on curlers. When this dries the most beautiful natural looking waves and crosses imaginable are in evidence. Wind and heat do not affect the curliness. Liquid silmerine is so pure and harmless there is not the slightest danger of spotting the scalp or streaking the hair, and it leaves no sticky or greasy trace. It keeps the hair soft, silky and lustrous.

AMERICANS PAY TRIBUTE AT GRAVE OF LAFAYETTE

Near His Burial Place Lie Hundreds of Victims of the Guillotine, Prayed For Perpetually by the Sisters in the Convent That Guards the Hallowed Ground.

By HELEN MACARTNEY.

"Lafayette nous voici! "—The long procession of those you saved, whose great experiment in freedom you made a success. Through the length and breadth of America the free no name stands higher than yours today. Our Presidents, our Generals, our statesmen bring their wreaths, their flags, their palms to lay on your grave, claiming you as their own, for that brave heart, now stilled, worked out our salvation!

ONE night in 1776 the old Maréchal de Broglie, Commander of the forces at Strasbourg, was giving a dinner party in honor of the Duke of Gloster. This light-hearted Duke had just married the Countess Waldegrave, and being in deep disgrace with his royal brother, George III., he took this compulsory occasion for a trip abroad. He was maliciously regaling the table at the King's expense with a humorous account of America's affront to England and the scene with the tea chests in Boston harbor. His sympathy was all with the rebels and he dwelt on their need of recruits. This was the first that France had heard of American independence.

Among his numerous audience, officers in blue and silver, Strasbourg grandees in gold lace and velvet, exclaiming, laughing, gesticulating, was one silent, solemn-faced young soldier of 19. He was lean, red-haired, hook-nosed, very awkward. He might have seemed insignificant had it not been for his eager eyes, and indifferent had he not kept them intent on the speaker's face. Nobody noticed him.

After dinner he strode across the room to the Duke and opened his lips for the first time. His manner was calm, almost cold. "I will join the Americans. I will help them fight for freedom," he cried, and as he spoke his face was illuminated. "Tell me how to set about it!"

So we rejoice that when his time came he was laid to rest in this sacred spot in France, buried in earth brought from America's sacred spot—Bunker Hill.

In the days when General Horace Porter was Minister to France, I was spending the month of May in Paris. A devoted member of the G. A. R., he decided to gather all the Americans he could find and hold services beside Lafayette's tomb on Decoration Day. We were asked to come to a small cemetery on the eastern side of Paris, near the Vincennes Gate, quite close to the Place de la Nation. This was indeed old Paris, centuries old, far from the City of Learning and the City of Frou Frou, and now the heart of the people's quarter—a strange place for the grave of a hero and a nobleman who died less than a hundred years ago.

After a journey from my home of at least five miles, I found myself at the entrance, a stranger in a strange land. Before me was a long wall of a convent, whose tinkling bell brought to the door a sweet-faced sister in the white garb of the Sacred Heart. Passing through the building, we went into the garden, where sat other sisters, their white frilled caps and white habits lighted up by the flaming red of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, embroidered on the left side. It was in this garden that Jean Valjean was saved from his pursuers by the Abbess, who pretended he was her gardener.

At the end of the path lay a small graveyard whose gray, old stones bore the most famous names of France—de Crillon, de Montagu, de Montmorency, de Noailles, de Gramont, and, at the last, Lafayette. Then came a stone wall, set with memorial tablets, in the middle of it an iron gate or grille leading into an enclosure. Lafayette's grave lay close to this wall and was covered with a large flat stone bearing his name:

"Marie Jean Paul Roche Yves Gilbert de Motier, Marquis de Lafayette. Born at Chavagnac, Sept. 6th, 1757, died at Paris May 20th, 1834."

"Marie Adrienne Françoise de Noailles. Born 1759. Died 1807."

This was enclosed by an iron railing and was in perfectly good condition. Its only ornament then was a marker set up by the Sons of the American Revolution of Massachusetts.

The speakers stood close to the grave, the listeners across the path to the left, and, as one after another, General Porter, ex-President Harrison and one of the Lasteyrie family, a descendant of Lafayette's daughter Virginie, made addresses, my eyes wandered idly over the tablets set in the wall. One was to the memory of André Chénier, the poet of the Revolution. I thought of Muller's wonderful "Last Roll Call in the Conciergerie," where Chénier sits on a chair turned sideways, his head resting on his hand and in his face a mixture of courage and despair. Another tablet, more recent, was to the memory of some nuns who perished at the time of the Commune.

I looked through the grille into the quiet enclosure. On the greenest grass ever made bright by May sunshine, stood a small obelisk to the memory of Prince Salm-Kirbourg, the last of Robespierre's victims to perish by the guillotine. Otherwise the turf was unbroken—a serene, peaceful spot. Suddenly as I glanced up at the lintel, I felt my heart stand still, as I read, "Within this enclosure lie the remains of 1,300 victims who fell under the Terror at the Barrière du Trône." I was standing by the most sacred place in all France, "la Cimetière des Guillontins," with its terrible memories, and was wondering at its quiet peace.

"For the passing souls we pray,
Saviour, meet them on their way."

At the time of the Revolution, the guillotine was first set up in Place de la Concorde, then a field outside the city limits. The bodies were thrown into a ditch, a "Fosse Commune," near the Madeleine, now built over except at the "Chapelle Expiatoire," which marks where the remains were found of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette.

After the execution of thousands, the neighbors complained; they were tired of seeing the nobility of France go bravely to their death—tired of the crowds and the constant excitement. So to please them the authorities moved the place of execution to the Barrière du Trône, at the eastern limit of the city. In the last six months of the Terror, 1,300 more met their doom here, people of high and low estate and of all ages, as the list in the chapel shows.

The revolution at end, the relatives of the condemned tried to find where their beloved dead lay. They could not tell where the Fosse Commune was, but "at last discovered a poor girl, a half-starved lace meader, who unseen had followed the tumbril containing the bodies of her father and brother to the place where the cart was unloaded." It was a desolate region and had belonged to a ruined convent. They could not buy this, for it had already been purchased by the Prince of Salm, whose brother was guillotined, but they did get the adjoining acres. They built a convent called "L'Oratoire de Picpus," with a garden and a cemetery adjoining the Fosse Commune. No one might be buried there who was not related to one of the "Guillotinés," and soon it was filled with stones bearing the noblest French names.

Lafayette had been left an orphan at 13, with a large fortune, and a year later he fell in love with a little lady of 12, Marie Adrienne Françoise, daughter of the Duc d'Ayen and granddaughter of the Maréchal de Noailles, the most illustrious family in France. The serious-minded Duchesse d'Ayen objected to him as a son-in-law because "he was too rich," but love at last prevailed and at 16 he was united to his beloved Adrienne. They said of him that all through his long life he was swayed by two passions—love for his wife and for freedom; but if these ever clashed, freedom won the day.

Under the Terror, Mme. d'Ayen, her oldest daughter, Louise, and her mother-in-law, the Maréchale de Noailles—three generations—all went to the scaffold on the same day. When in 1807 Mme. Lafayette died she asked to be buried close to the spot where they lay, for the de Noailles had been noted for generations as the most loving family in the world. Lafayette had none of his own relatives in the Fosse Commune, but when twenty-seven years later he passed away at the age of 77 they laid him by Adrienne's side.

The cemetery is under the care of the nuns of the "Sacred Heart and Sacred Blood," as this particular branch is called, Sisters in the Convent of the Perpetual Adoration. For nearly a hundred and twenty years they have carried on a "perpetual intercession" for the souls of the 1,300 who died unshriven. If you go into the chapel you will see two nuns praying before the altar. Just as the hour is about to strike two more enter. Over their white habits they have thrown long white veils, and from their shoulders hang blood-red Court trains, in memory of the Terror. They walk slowly up the aisle; as the clock begins to strike they take the place of the kneeling nuns for one hour's devotion. This they have done night and day ever since the Revolution.

You will often see the French nobility of the Faubourg St. Germain at their vespers, faces that recall the old portraits. Until lately they held a solemn service at the end of April, when, dressed in mourning, they passed in procession through the cemetery and the grille and knelt in prayer above the Fosse Commune, begging for mercy on the souls of those beneath who had died unshriven.

Now it has become a place of pilgrimage for Americans! On the railing of Lafayette's grave hang bronze replicas of the wreaths brought by ex-President Wilson and General Pershing. There is an American flag set up by a returning officer of the A. E. F., and there are other tokens from the country that loves him.

One hears complaints of the difficulty of finding the Oratoire de Picpus. If you choose to go by automobile, drive from the Place de la Concorde straight east through the longest street in Paris—the Rue de Rivoli. After two miles it changes its name and becomes the Rue St. Antoine. It passes through the Place de la Bastille and is then the Fauberg (or suburb) St. Antoine. As you go, memories haunt you and you lean from the car, watching for Dr. Manette and Lucie—for St. Evremonde and the Vengeance, and above all for Sidney Carton.

Straight east you go until you reach the Place de la Nation, the old Place du Trone, where Louis XIV. set up his throne to watch his victorious troops marching home after their conquests. Here two lofty Doric columns mark the site of the old Barriere or octroi gate of Paris, where the guillotine was erected. Now turn from the Place de la Nation due south, through the small street Fabre d'Eglantine, and in five minutes you will find yourself at the corner of the Rue de Picpus and the Avenue St. Mande. At 25 Rue de Picpus is the Oratoire.

If you do not want to go by automobile, take the subway to the Place de la Nation, go down the Rue Fabre d'Eglantine and visit the Oratoire. Then take a trolley that you will find near by for Charenton. It goes, I think, out the Porte de Picpus, crosses the Bois de Vincennes, the people's beautiful park. Just as the Bois de Boulogne, on the western side of Paris, belongs to the élite, so the Vincennes Park is the property of the poilu and his family. The trolley takes you through the park to Charenton, where you will find the river steamers that give you a swift and delightful ride down the Seine to the Place de la Concorde.

FARMERS AND HIGH TAXES TWO BIG ISSUES IN 1924

there are four questions widely discussed, although no one can now estimate their relative importance, and, of course, there will not be unanimous agreement as to their relative importance even when election day arrives.

First I would put the condition of the American farmer. He is suffering more than any other class and the farmer makes up one-third of the nation in population. The price level is disjointed; the farmer buys upon a level almost 50 per cent. higher than the level upon which he sells. This is ruinous and, in time, spells bankruptcy. No other question is likely to influence the farmer's thought and political action so much as that question.

The second question affects the laboring class, the next group in size to the agricultural group. There are certain readjustments necessary to insure equity to the laboring men, but the most disturbing feature of the situation is the increasing antagonism between labor and capital—the class consciousness manifested by members of both groups. The attitude of the Government is alarming to the laboring men, and this alarm has been increased by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in which five of the court denied the right of Congress to fix a minimum wage—three Judges dissenting and one not taking part in the decision. This is another of the five to four decisions and still further intensifies the desire of the masses for legislation or constitutional provision which will make it impossible for a bare majority of the Supreme Court to nullify legislation on questions which are more political than judicial in their character.

The third issue deals with the curbing of the profiteer. Those who are in position to organize can charge what the traffic will bear, and are doing so, while those who cannot organize are the victims not only of natural conditions but of the artificial conditions which monopoly creates. Something must be done; it remains to be seen whether the situation will be relieved by the action of the next Congress or aggravated by its failure to act.

Taxation is the fourth domestic issue. Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, is already suggesting a further reduction in the surtax—a policy which puts the pecuniary interests of the rich above the necessities of those not do well-to-do. It is shifting the burden of taxation from the backs of the strong to the backs of the weak. As the Democrats and the progressives combined will have a majority in both houses it is not likely that any such reactionary policy can be successful.

There will of course be many other issues, but I mention the above as issues that affect very large groups and which will therefore have strong public opinion back of them. When we know what the issues are we shall be in position to discuss candidates. Events make issues and issues make candidates.

HARDING ADMINISTRATION PRAISED FOR ACHIEVEMENTS

By SENATOR SELDEN P. SPENCER, Republican, from the Middle West.

There is a general feeling that the Administration has made great progress in the handling of a difficult situation. Taxes have been reduced, efficiency increased, economy practiced and the general condition of the country greatly improved.

The President, particularly in the last few months, has materially grown in the confidence and esteem of the people. In international relationships his advocacy of the United States supporting the Permanent Court of International Justice has pleased a great number of people. It is a step in the right direction.

It does not mean identification with the League of Nations. The court is an independent tribunal and is not subject to the League of Nations. It is in existence today and is performing useful service and is a necessary factor in world conditions abroad. Whatever difference of opinion there may be about the matter, there cannot be raised a partisan political difference, for there will be no issue between the two parties on this subject, and therefore negligible in a Presidential campaign, with all the advantage in favor of the Republican side of it.

Tariff is Upheld.

The tariff is producing splendid results. The financial returns are better than was expected, and its working out is distinctly advantageous to American interests. There are many details of its operation which have yet to be adjusted and corrected, but the general feeling of confidence is manifest.

The condition in the Democratic Party is more or less chaotic. It would be difficult to select a Democratic candidate upon whom there could be any general agreement. Mr. Ford, who undoubtedly is extremely anxious to become a candidate, will have a great deal of support, but not enough to secure the two-thirds majority which is a requisite in a Democratic convention.

As far as can be seen at the present moment, the outlook for the Republican Party is exceedingly good, and if the general condition of the country, both industrially and agriculturally, continues to improve, or remains as it is, the chances are strongly in favor of Republican success.

LOWER RAIL RATES DEMAND OF FARMERS

By GRAY SILVER of American Farm Bureau Federation.

AMONG the foremost issues will be transportation rates. The farmers are going to insist on lower transportation rates, for they are cost factors which enter both into the sale of farm products and into the price which farmers have to pay for the commodities they use or consume.

The farmers possibly have a keener interest in railroad rates than any other class. This is true because they pay 55 per cent. or more of the four billion dollars representing the cost of transportation in this country, and this is a heavy toll on the farmers' pocketbooks. Of the total production of American farm products, twelve to fourteen billion dollars annually, eight to ten billion dollars worth leave the farm. The question of transportation begins at the farmers' gates. The freight transportation bill is something like four billion dollars, and since the farmers pay a little more than half of this the farmers' railroad bill amounts to about two billion dollars. Around one-fifth of the farmers' gross income goes to the railroads.

As long as there is a discrepancy in the price of manufactured products when compared with agricultural products there will continue to be agitation for arbitrary Government price fixing. This probably will not be fostered by members of the farm bloc and those candidates aspiring permanently to better the position of agriculture, for the fixing of prices on agricultural products would prove only a boomerang to the farmers. Should the price of their commodities be fixed and not the price of commodities which they have to buy, the farmers would be greatly out-traded, for their price would be stabilized or fixed, whereas the prices of manufactured products would be increased to meet the desires of the manufacturers, who control their own price fixing.

Farmers' taxes have increased so greatly during the last few years that the subject of taxation also will be a national issue.

The farmers' part of the total tax bill has increased from $824,000,000 in 1923 to $1,232,000,000 in 1919 and $1,497,000,000 in 1921 and $1,436,000,000 in 1922. At the same time the taxes levied on the rest of the community increased from $1,570,000,000 in 1913 to $6,866,000,000 in 1922 and $5,625,000,000 in 1922. The fact that while the non-farming community's tax burden has increased $4,055,000,000 since 1913, and the farmers' tax bill has advanced only $812,000,000 does not show that the farmer fails to bear his just proportion of the increase.

Taxes must be related closely to the ability of the taxed to pay. When placed upon this basis the farmers' tax burden becomes relatively much heavier than that of other classes. In 1922 the ratio of taxation to income for agricultural classes was about 16 per cent. That for the remainder of the country was only about 12 per cent. The farmers pay more in relation to their income than any other class in the United States, yet it is a fact that the farmer has fewer conveniences than the city dweller. Since taxes go for community improvement, it would seem only equitable and just that the ratio of taxation be changed.

The farmers will continue to be against a sales tax and for a tax on profits and earnings as well as an inheritance tax.

If the next Congress does not accept Henry Ford's offer for Muscle Shoals, it is a foregone conclusion that the farmers, keen in their desire for cheap fertilizers, will make the economics involved in the Ford offer a paramount issue. The consumer of agricultural products as well as the producer, when he understands the far-reaching effect of cheaper fertilizers and the adaptation of water power for the production of electricity, will join with the farmers in this demand.

The farmers are going to continue their interest in legislation which makes for truthful statements concerning commodities offered for sale. They have a test case in the Truth-in-fabrics bill, which would make it illegal to sell woolen goods unless marked truthfully to show the amount of wool, shoddy and other fibers which they contain.

If the Truth-in-fabrics bill is not disposed of by the Congress which convenes in December and enacted along the lines which the farmers demand, it also will be an issue upon which candidates will be asked to commit themselves favorably. The farmers' interest in foreign relations, especially as they affect our markets and outlet, will continue.

If the next Congress does not provide for the compiling of crop insurance information, so that agencies may enter this field on a more stable basis, rural voters will seek to learn the attitude of candidates.

The wet and dry issue and the other matters which the politicians are pressing to the front are important, but they are not sufficiently important for the farmer to allow them to supersede the adjustment of farm problems.

TAXPAYERS' PROBLEM PRESSES FOR SOLUTION

By REPRESENTATIVE OTIS WINGO, Member of House Committee on Banking and Currency.

THE issues of the next campaign are likely to be as they have been for the last few campaigns, varied on account of sections and different interests. If I had my way about it the Democrats would go to the country on a postal card platform. By a postal card platform I mean a short, simple declaration of the fundamental tenets of the Democratic Party. I would simply write that the Democratic Party reaffirms its allegiance to the time-honored principles of the party, chiefly economy in public expenditures, the lowest possible taxation consistent with an economical administration of affairs, a return to local self government, and a cessation of multiplying Federal activities.

In my opinion in the next campaign the business interests of the country are going to be more interested in taxation and economy in public expenditures than ever before. The waste of public funds by the present inefficient administration of public affairs is increasing, instead of decreasing, as the people had a right to expect as we got away from the confusion and haste and relaxation of vigilance that necessarily existed during and immediately after the war.

There should be some rearrangement of the administration of our tax laws so as to escape the injustice that frequently is worked on taxpayers who act in good faith. There should be some way by which the taxpayer should have a prompt and conclusive statement of tax liability so that he and his business enterprises will not be harassed by the unexpected assertion of a claim of liability by the Government which he did not know existed. Each taxpayer should have an opportunity for an impartial hearing and have his liability concluded and settled.

So far as the farming interests are concerned they are not satisfied with the makeshift political "bunk" that has been handed out to them by this Administration. The farmer believes that there is something radically wrong with the distribution and transportation system of the country, and whether you agree with him or not he believes that legislation can be enacted that not only will inure to his benefit but to the relief of the general public.

Another issue in the next campaign that will be in the minds of all classes of voters is that of the high cost of living and profiteering. The people remember that in the last campaign the Republicans promised to reduce the high cost of living and stop profiteering. In the last campaign the Republicans took advantage of the natural reaction from war and unsettled conditions. They pandered to every passion, played to every prejudice, grovelled at the feet of every group, promising everything to all, and blamed the Democrats for every condition, but in the next campaign this Administration will be held to a strict accounting upon the issues of taxation, distribution and transportation, foreign policy, high cost of living and profiteering.

SAYS WE MUST UPHOLD CONSTITUTION FIRST

By WALTER H. NEWTON, House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ONE year in advance of the party conventions it is rather difficult to set forth even the probable issues of the 1924 campaign. This much seems to me to be certain. The major issue, and it probably will come up before the platform committees of the two great parties, is whether this country is to continue with constitutional government as we have heretofore known it. There is an element in our country which of late has been increasing in strength, seeking to do away in great measure with restraints in our fundamental law. The agitation for certain constitutional amendments and restrictions upon the power of the Supreme Court, prohibiting that court from declaring a law unconstitutional, is evidence in itself of the activities of those who would do away with all restrictions upon the power of the majority. Any restriction of this character upon the Supreme Court would be the first step in the removal of those constitutional guarantees for the benefit of every citizen. The Republican Party has consistently stood steadfast against assaults of this character, and if any one of the opposition parties even hints toward an amendment of this nature it will be the major issue.

In the next campaign we also will get down to fundamental issues in another question. The Constitution now prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes and enjoins Congress to enforce the provision by legislation. Pursuant to this, Congress passed the National Prohibition act. Very few persons advocate the repeal of the amendment. Many advocate its repudiation both by individual citizens and by Congress. This being part of the fundamental law, every citizen should obey it and certainly Congress should carry out the duty conferred upon it. The Republican Party is committed to law enforcement, and any wavering by opposition parties or their candidates will make this an issue.

The tariff is always an issue, but the Fordney-McCumber bill has worked out so successfully that it does not seem to me that this will figure prominently. Our revenues have multiplied, imports have increased and our exports have expanded. All of this may make it possible to effect a further and much needed reduction in taxation.

There is agitation in certain quarters for an increase in immigration. This may be needed, but if so the law should be so amended as to have the increase come from those peoples who have been most readily assimilated. Personally I would like to see the principle of the quota law retained, but use the 1890 census as a basis.

RECORD OF PRESIDENT REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

By GEORGE B. LOCKWOOD, Secretary Republican National Committee.

THE record of the Harding Administration necessarily will be the platform of the Republican Party in 1924. Domestic issues will be dominant unless the Democratic National Convention again espouses the League of Nations, in which case European involvement will become paramount.

The work of restoration and reconstruction effected nationally by the Republican Party, with the improvement in economic conditions which has followed Republican administration and enactments, will give to the Republican Party its main appeal for popular favor in next year's national campaign.

The wet and dry issue can become paramount only through some unexpected declaration of hostility to the enforcement of the prohibition amendment by the Democratic National Convention.

PANAMA CANAL EARNED BIG PROFIT LAST YEAR

ANTICIPATING the Panama Canal annual report for the fiscal year ended June 30, which will not be out until about the time of President Harding's next annual message to Congress, the announcement can be made that the great trans-isthmian waterways has had the greatest year in its history and has established itself beyond peradventure as a paying concern.

All the canal's nine years except three have been paying years, but the margin in the year just ended is so much bigger than in any previous year that no doubt can longer exist of the earning power of the big ditch.

This remarkable year began by breaking the record for monthly tolls, July showed receipts of $1,094,127 from ships passing through the canal. Barring a slight decrease in the following two months of August and September, not another of the remaining nine months failed to surpass July, the progressive increase culminating in May, the eleventh month, when the receipts were nearly twice those of July, namely $1,972,216. June failed to surpass this record, so May remains the banner month.

With the cost of operation about $7,500,000 (this last figure the estimate of Colonel Jay J. Morrow, Governor of the Panama Canal), a clear profit of quite $10,000,000 shows to the credit of the canal, and this figure ought very closely to approximate the year's net results, as against $3,789,833 in the previous year, although there will be the auxiliary business operations of the canal to be mixed with it.

These business operations in 1921-22 came within $323,259 of balancing each other in favor of revenues. They are believed sure to make an even better showing in 1922-23. The net gain of $10,000,000 for the year already estimated is therefore more likely to be increased than to be reduced by the net result of the business operations, which include the Panama Railroad, the Panama Steamship Line, the mechanical shops, the material storehouses and fuel oil plants conducted by the canal and those conducted by the railroad, including coaling plants, commissaries and the cattle industry.

In other words, the year was more than two and a half times as good as the previous year. When this magnificent showing was unfolding itself, Colonel Morrow expressed his satisfaction with the state of affairs by saying: "Receipts from canal tolls are paying all expenses of operation, upkeep, depreciation, interest at 3 per cent. on the canal bonds, &c., leaving a net balance of from $60,000 to $70,000 a month. We have written off about $100,000,000 of the canal bond issue of about $375,000,000."

Under a recent ruling of the Secretary of War, the commercial value of the canal was determined as $246,418,989 for transit capital and $28,760,360 for business capital. The reduction from the $375,000,000 of the canal bond issue was effected by writing off all expenditures in excess of $246,418,989, partly as defense capital expenditures and partly in accordance with established methods of depreciation.

Thus the answer is supplied to the following in Governor Morrow's report for 1921-22: "The question of whether the canal pays in the commercial sense will henceforth be answered according as the receipts from all sources pay for all expenses (including depreciation), and, in addition, 3 per cent. (adopted as rate of interest on Panama Canal bonds) on the capital investment."

One may look, therefore, for a triumphant note in the forthcoming annual report, and a bit of crowing over the erstwhile critics of the building of the canal. The critics contended that while the canal was possible as an engineering feat it could not be dug without such a lavish expenditure of money that the enterprise could not be a commercial success, even if the entire tonnage of the world used it. They held that the United States was getting a white elephant on its hands.

Landslides were expected to be baffling. It was declared that the engineers would never be able to stop Culebra and Cucaracha from sliding back and refilling the cuts through those dreaded hills that had thwarted the French. Then there was the uncontrollable Chagres River, which, in the rainy season, overflowing its banks, would inundate the canal and bring everything to naught.

Goethals, Gorgas and other distinguished engineers conquered these obstacles and all the others in their path, brilliantly succeeding in building the canal and keeping it open. Thus one part of the prophecy was never fulfilled. Now the other part comes tumbling down with a crash in the evidence that the cost was not so great that the canal could not be made to pay.

All of which should be sufficient answer to the whilom critics, yet further refutation is at hand in an authoritative opinion that the capacity of the canal to transit ships could be doubled easily. The engineers say that practically all that would be necessary for that purpose would be an additional series of locks at three points. By thus doubling its capacity the canal would not reach its maximum for probably one hundred years.

RESTORING THE MINETTAS FOR ARTISTS AND WRITERS

Syndicate Has Acquired Twenty-five Old Houses for Artistic Treatment—King of the Rag Pickers Forced to Move

Every so often during the last ten years it has become the custom to refer to that quaint aggregation of narrow streets and diminutive houses known as the Minettas, in the upper Greenwich Village area, as needing modern improvement and sprucing up, with the announcement that persons of sentimental and financial resources are preparing to undertake the job. Four years ago a fairly serious effort was started. Half a dozen houses were put in more livable condition and the artistic possibilities of the locality were recommended to all partial to Greenwich Village atmosphere.

So far as this plan went it was all right, but it did not go far enough. With additional money and a wider range of artistic sentiment another plan has just been launched which, as it involves the renovation of twenty-five houses out of about thirty-five in the Minetta centre, seems assured of greater success and popular appreciation. The former purchasers and improvers have sold out to the new syndicate, which has just been incorporated as the Minetta Dwellings Inc., of which D. H. Miller is President and Secretary and Alexander Hamerslaugh, Treasurer. The accumulation of the property was made by Vincent C. Pepe, who has had his eye on the Minettas for half a dozen years and has been responsible for practically all of the reclamation work that has gone on there. He has been appointed manager of the contemplated operation as Vice President of the company.

Mr. Miller said last week that he had been attracted to the possibilities of a genuine artistic improvement of the Minettas as a result of the remodeling of the little houses in Grove Court, once known as Pig a Alley, a short time ago, and he was one of the purchasers at the time. The same general principle will be followed in the Minettas. The exterior of the houses will be unaltered except where an artistic treatment will bring them more into harmony with those that still retain their dormer window attics and other evidences of better days revealed in the early Colonial type of the doorways. Inside the houses will be altered for one, two or three families, on the studio type, adapted for occupancy by artists, writers or other professional persons.

The Minettas compose one of the most interesting sections of the city. The area lies between Carmine Street, at the lower end of Sixth Avenue, Bleecker, Macdougal and Third Streets. At the junction of Sixth Avenue and Carmine Street Minetta Lane runs easterly one block to Macdougal Street. It is bisected on the southerly side by Minetta Street, a narrow and crooked thoroughfare one block long ending at Bleecker Street. Jutting off from Minetta Lane, a few feet east of Carmine Street, is Minetta Alley, terminating at the rear of the houses in Minetta Place. Access to the latter is through an alley from Minetta Street, just north of Bleecker Street.

Mr. Miller's syndicate has obtained control of all of the houses on the west side of Minetta Street except the Bleecker Street corner and all on the east side except those on the latter corner, the seven-story tenement at 11 and 13, running through to Macdougal and the house at 15. It is proposed to lease the ground floors of the double tenement, now used as stores, and remodel them in harmony with the house plan. The most important acquisition comprised the five buildings on the west side of Minetta Street at the Minetta Lane corner, chief of which are 16, 18, 20 and 22 Minetta Street. Colored tenants have long occupied the upper floors, but for many years the lower portion of two have been used as stores for rags and they have been owned by Joseph di Scale, popularly known as the "King of the Rag Pickers."

These houses have hitherto been the barrier to a comprehensive renovation of the Minetta quarter. They do not possess the small dormer windows as do the adjoining houses below. They are, however, of the same old red brick construction and in the new architectural scheme they will be restored in keeping with their more respectable neighbors. On the east side the houses are less attractive, but they also will be treated so as to suggest the appearance of their better days three-quarters of a century ago.

The five small houses in Minetta Place are among the most interesting places of their kind on Manhattan Island. Entering the narrow alley from the street, one meets a vista of flowers and well-kept plants, while the spot is as free from noise and as peaceful as though miles away from the busy city traffic barely one hundred feet distant. It is the plan of the promoters to remove the high fence shutting off the yard at the rear of the houses facing Minetta Street, at 2, 4, 6 and 8, providing a community garden. Mr. Miller is also considering the feasibility of making an arched gateway from the alley at Minetta Lane by cutting through the house at 23 Minetta Lane, thereby giving access to Minetta Place.

The sale of the realty covered by the twenty-five houses acquired by the new corporation is placed at about $250,000 and it is estimated that the improvements will represent an additional $150,000. The rag pickers and the few colored tenants who remain in some of the houses on Minetta Lane will vacate, it is said, early in the Fall, when active restoration work will begin on several of the old-timers. Associated with the Minetta Dwellings Corporation is the Alcantair Realty Company which owned the Minetta Place houses and two or three fronting the same waters. They remodeled three years ago.

Beneath several of the Minetta houses still runs the famous little stream, known to the early Dutch settlers as Mintje Kill and which emptied in the North River over the foot of Houston Street. When the British captured New Amsterdam, Mintje Kill was angliceised to Minetta Brook. The Minettas and adjoining property, amounting altogether to about 200 acres, were granted to the British Governor Sir Peter Warren, and his country mansion stood, until the middle of the last century, in the block bounded by Charles, Fourth, Perry and Bleecker Streets.

As late as 1840, the brook supplied the wells of the fashionable residents of De Pau Row with water. Such men as A. T. Stewart, Dr. Valentine Mott and Washington Coster drew their water from this source. Aaron Burr on Richmond Hill, in an earlier period, may also have tapped the same waters. Sir Peter Warren's house finally became the home of Abraham Van Nest, who occupied it up to the time of his death. Mr. Van Nest, after whom Van Nest Place is named, was much esteemed in his time, and is still remembered as an organizer of the Greenwich Savings Bank, and later as its President.

"If the Minettas" explained Mr. Pepe, "are to become the 'Latin Quarter of New York' they must offer homes at prices, whether for rental or for sale, that are within the means of the workers in the arts for whom they are intended. To keep our artists with us, we must offer them the atmosphere they crave and the comfort they require, at a price which they can afford. The future of art and letters in New York requires this service."

NEW NATIONAL BANK.

To Be Opened in Bushwick Section of Brooklyn.

With subscriptions exceeding $122,000, already paid, and a daily demand for stock, the proposed Bushwick National Bank will be opened in the vicinity of Broadway and Halsey Street about Aug. 15.

The capital stock of the new bank has been fixed at $200,000, with a surplus of $100,000, making a total of $300,000.

BETTER ROAD PLAN FOR LONG ISLAND

Civic Associations of Brooklyn and Queens Urge United Action to Improve Roads.

Leading civic associations in Brooklyn and Queens have been striving for a year to obtain for Long Island improvement of what is known as the "Sunrise Trails," which are so congested at the western entrances to them as to result occasionally in almost complete stagnation. At a meeting held recently in the Hotel Bossert, called by the Long Island Association, plans were formulated for the creation of co-operative action on the part of all of the civic associations. The objective is the improvement of all of the existing roads and the building of new boulevards leading directly through Long Island.

The plan outlined calls for two highways from Brooklyn and two from Queens, to reach to the tip of Montauk Point. Frank G. Holly, President of the Executive Committee of the Long Island Association, explains the reason for the effort to seek for the project the united aid of the various civic associations in an article written for "Brooklyn," a publication of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce. He says that the western entrance to the trails on Long Island act as the neck of a bottle, which chokes vast possibilities of business development throughout the island by forcing the use of circuitous routes which lead anywhere except to the active business centres of the island. He also says:

"The Long Island Association believes that much good can be accomplished by securing the co-operation of the leading business factors at the western end of the island. It must be borne in mind at all times that this movement is not to be used for the purpose of, in any way advancing the interests of one section as against the other, but in view of the fact that Brooklyn, Queens and Jamaica are located at the entrance to the "Sunrise Trails," a solidification of interests is very desirable in an effort to improve existing roads or build new boulevards to connect with the main arteries of Long Island.

"The situation is one that requires careful thought, whereby concrete action may be taken by the Long Island Association, Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, the Queens Chamber of Commerce and Jamaica Board of Trade, collectively, to use their vast influence to awaken the municipal and State authorities to the necessity of providing, without any further delay, what might be properly termed glaring necessities in order to keep in step with the growth and expansion of our various Long Island communities.

"This actually a case where an injury to one section is the concern of all, because this situation affects Brooklyn, Queens and Jamaica alike, and what affects Queens or Jamaica must naturally affect Brooklyn. In other words, there is no better means of drawing attention to the need of co-operation than to refer to one of the fundamentals of mathematics which we all know, and that is, things that are equal to other things are equal to each other, so we must all go forward together or else if we fail in one direction the results of the failure will be felt by all concerned.

"Improvements in road conditions where the shopper of Brooklyn and Queens on Long Island may find direct ingress and egress to shopping centres will improve business in those sections.

"It is suggested that the slogan of the movement shall be 'Tie the Sunrise Trails,' and that it shall be placed in conspicuous letters at the main entrances to them to the end that it may become identified with the expansion of Long Island, the 'fastest growing community of the United States.' Mr. Holly thinks that this feature will be of great advertising advantage and he expresses the hope:

"That the great business interests of the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens will co-operate with their brothers down on Long Island, and by so doing create a spirit of friendliness and brotherly spirit which will bring closer co-operation and will eventually produce greater and lasting benefits to all."

THERE is nothing at the present time to suggest that the easing off in building activities throughout the country during the last two months will continue to such an extent as to affect the national building situation and business in general.

"From all parts of the United States there are strong inquiries for capital to be used in building purposes. These inquiries indicate a general assumption among those most interested in the improvement of property that to go ahead with building projects at this time is in keeping with sound business practices, notwithstanding the agitation that has been raised in many quarters regarding building costs.

"The fact is becoming more generally understood that a pronounced slowing up of building work in the United States now would be little short of a national calamity," according to a statement issued yesterday by S. W. Straus & Co. "To gain an appreciation of the consequences of widespread recessions in building activity one has only to familiarize himself with the fundamentals of the building situation and to consider as well the adverse effects which such a slowing up would have on the general business of the country. Not only are there few lines of industry which would not be crippled by a general let-down in building operations, but such developments would also mean additional increases in all building costs, thus passing an added burden to the public in the way of higher rents and higher living costs.

Housing Shortage Still Exists.

"Notwithstanding the very extensive building operations of the last four years, the general housing shortage during that period has not been diminished by more than 25 per cent., according to the best information obtainable.

"New construction and alteration work so far this year is more than one-half billion dollars ahead of any previous half year in the nation's history, but increased costs have absorbed a large share of the apparent gain in volume of building since the war."

At the office of Tenement Commissioner Frank Mann it was stated last week only 3,698 out of 1,010,457 apartments in the City of New York are vacant and that nearly half of these are old-law tenements in poor neighborhoods, constructed before 1901, when the statute requiring fireproof stairs and large air-shafts was enacted.

Any relief for the housing shortage in the last three months, said W. A. Robertson, Chief Inspector of the New Buildings Bureau, has been through the erection of two or three family dwellings in outlying sections.

Demands of Population Not Met.

He said that since March apartment construction has not caught up to the growth in population, which requires at least 21,000 new apartments a year and was met by a 20,000 average increase prior to the war.

Mr. Robertson is convinced, he said, that the situation will be worse next year.

East Side Development.

In a neighborhood which is assuming increasing importance in Manhattan, two interesting alterations are in progress, the completion of which will approximate Oct. 1 of this year.

The buildings are located on the northeast and southeast corners of Lexington Avenue and Fifty-eighth Street, and are known as 715 to 721 Lexington Avenue, 164 East Fifty-eighth Street, 723 to 727 Lexington Avenue, and 135 and 137 East Fifty-eighth Street. On the north corner, located on a plot 65 by 76, the old buildings are being rebuilt into stores, business floors, offices and dwelling apartments. G. A. & H. Boehm are the supervising architects and the Marshall Construction Company has the general contract for the work from Mary E. Blake, owner.

On the southeast corner, on a plot approximately 80 by 85, the old buildings are being rebuilt under the supervision of G. A. & H. Boehm under plans made by Very & Brown. Richard Deeves & Sons have the general contract for the rebuilding of this corner.

This work involves the taking out of the first and second stories in these buildings, putting in modern floors and business stores, with housekeeping and non-housekeeping apartments above. When completed the two corners will be uniform in appearance, with light-colored buff exteriors done in stucco, with terra cotta trimmings.

As one of the most extensive and important operations on Lexington Avenue at the present time, it is interesting to note the gradual changes in Lexington Avenue in particular and in the general vicinity. Since the advent of the opening of the Lexington Avenue subway, Lexington Avenue is gradually being transformed from the old-fashioned brownstone fronts to a thoroughfare for modern high-class retail business along lines similar to the development of Madison Avenue between Forty-second and Fifty-ninth Streets.

Bank Buys Plot.

At 711 and 713 Lexington Avenue the Commonwealth Savings Bank has bought a plot on which they expect to erect a new bank building, the work having been temporarily suspended owing to uncertain building conditions.

On the southwest corner of Lexington Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street the Allerton House has erected a seventeen-story building for women. Other property in the immediate neighborhood has been changing hands rapidly within the last few months and in some cases plottages have been collected.

An effort has been made by some of the property owners having property south of Fifty-ninth Street to have the subway place an exit and entrance to the subway on the southerly side of Lexington Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street.

Film Veteran Building Hotel.

A. J. Bimberg, a well-known producer since the very early days of picture making, has laid aside his megaphone and cameras and is building a fifteen-story fireproof apartment hotel adjacent to the famous Lambs Club, on Forty-fourth Street.

When completed, in March, 1924, as planned by Architects Rouse & Goldstone, the cost will exceed the million mark by several hundred thousands.

New Model Apartment.

The first apartment house in New York erected under the new tenement house law, enabling the builder to construct an apartment with a considerably larger living room by not sacrificing valuable floor area in the kitchens, is now in course of erection at 17, 19 and 21 West Sixty-fourth Street.

The structure, which is being erected by a syndicate headed by J. Amron, President of the Marlborough Corporation, which operates the Marlborough Hotel, occupies a plot 50 by 100 and will represent an investment of about $350,000. It will be ready for Fall occupancy.

New Larchmont Apartment House.

The contracts for the erection of the Albee Court Apartment at Larchmont, Westchester County, have been awarded to the Wenemer Construction Company of New York City.

Among the Directors of the Directors Building Corporation, which will own and operate Albee Court, are Edward F. Albee of the Keith & Proctor theatrical circuit, who is also President of the corporation; Edward M. Dailey, President of the Paige-Detroit Company of New York, and George McGeachin, President of the Village of Larchmont and member of Witcombe, McGeachin & Co., New York.

One of the latest developments in the Bronx is the erection of thirteen three-family dwellings on the southwest corner of 177th Street and Pugsley Avenue. The improvement, which is being undertaken by the Henry Holding Construction Company, represents an investment of about $300,000. The houses will be ready for Fall occupancy, and sell for about $22,000 each.

INCREASED VALUES IN GARMENT CENTRE

An excellent example of the wonderful increase in real estate values that has taken place in the past couple of years in what is now known as the "Garment Centre" is to be found in the sale of the old State Arsenal, Seventh Avenue and Thirty-fifth Street, which was sold by Governor Smith Thursday at public auction for $1,350,000. Sixty-six years ago the State paid $29,000 for the site.

Several years ago, when the State first decided to sell it, they asked about $650,000 but failed to find a buyer.

It was about this time that the efforts of the Save New York Committee to clear the retail shopping zone of wholesale manufacturers began to be felt, and a building boom to accommodate the clothing and millinery trade was started in the district west of Sixth Avenue, between the Thirties and Forties.

Among the first of the largest operations was the erection of the Garment Centre buildings in Seventh Avenue, which now house hundreds of firms and give employment to thousands of garment workers.

As a result realty values have soared beyond the expectations of the most optimistic operator and the boom is still on.

Millions of dollars' worth of construction is now in progress in the section and a number of new buildings are planned for 1924 occupancy.

The efforts of the Save New York Committee, which was conceived and organized through the efforts of John Howes Burton, were condemned by many at the outset, but the result has been the cleaning up of the retail shopping zone and the establishment of a new wholesale district in a section of the city that had laid dormant for years.

New realty values have been created and they are likely to go much higher than they are today. The price paid for the arsenal property is only one example of enhanced values.

The purchasers of the arsenal property were Henry Greenberg, 47 Suffolk Street; Maurice Blenstock, 1,305 Fifty-seventh Street, Brooklyn, and Louis Bergias, of 8 Fulton Street, Brooklyn.

The three men are builders, and their attorney, Ralph V. Wechler of 395 Broadway, said they would begin immediately by the erection of a $4,500,000 loft and office building to be part of the garment industry "capital."

Four Playground Sites.

The city has purchased from the State for Brooklyn four playground sites, paying $1 for each site. They are located at Eighteenth Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street, 650 feet by 1,960 feet; Seeley Street and Terrace Place, 92 feet by 200 feet and 87 feet by 200 feet; Fifty-fourth Street, between Seventh and Eighth Avenue, 100 feet by 100 feet.

New Bank for Corona.

William T. James, President of the Queens County Savings Bank of Flushing, has received permission from the State to open a branch office in Corona, to be located at Forty-sixth and Beckett Streets. It is proposed to use all deposits received at the branch on building loans in Corona and vicinity.

Bank Alterations.

Edward M. Adelsohn, architect of 1,778 Pitkin Avenue, is preparing plans of alterations for the Municipal Bank, Eastern Parkway and Kingston Avenue, Brooklyn, to cost about $50,000.

BIG HOUSING PROJECT FOR TRACT IN NEW ROCHELLE

Plot in Stephenson Park Purchased by Builders for Improvement With Up-to-Date Frame Houses at Moderate Prices

The New Rochelle Housing Corporation has been formed for the purpose of providing homes for persons of moderate means. The organization is fostered by the New Rochelle Rotary Club, and there will be no thought of financial gain in its operations. It is organized with a capital of $200,000, most of which is already subscribed. The Directors are George Watson, builder and President of the People's Bank for Savings; J. Arthur Huntington, Secretary of the New Rochelle Trust Company; Frank M. Carpenter, President of the New Rochelle Coal and Lumber Company; Howard R. Ware, President of the Howard R. Ware Corporation and Director of the National City Bank of New Rochelle; John H. Troy, landscape architect; City Judge Samuel F. Swinburne, Auckland B. Cordner, Edwin G. Reynolds Jr., President of the New Rochelle Chamber of Commerce; Russell A. Young, President of the George Ferguson Company; Charles A. Kreitler, Joseph M. Baltz and Robert S. Rennicks.

A tract of land in Stephenson Park, New Rochelle, has been purchased, and the construction of twenty moderate-priced frame houses will be commenced shortly by Joseph M. Baltz. The houses will front on Adams, Rhodes and Pratt Streets. It is aimed to build them so that they can be sold for about $8,000 each, which will include the cost and operating expenses only. Plans for five of these houses have been filed already with Building Inspector William H. Switzer.

One of the largest sales made recently in New Rochelle is that of the Rose Hill Nurseries, part of the estate of the late Emma S. Siebrecht, on North Avenue, New Rochelle. It was sold by the Realtick Realty Corporation to the International Contractors and Engineers, whose offices are in New York City. The property, which contains thirty acres with several houses, barns, stables, many greenhouses, ponds, drives and a large number of rare trees, was held at $300,000. It is opposite the Wykagyl Country Club, and will be developed for residences according to the ideas of Henry A. Siebrecht, the recent owner, so that few if any of the trees and landscape features will be sacrificed. It is likely that a railroad station will be erected at the rear of the property on the New York, Westchester & Boston Railway, where provision was made when the road was built. Mr. Siebrecht, who is a landscape architect and was for many years one of the leading florists of Fifth Avenue, New York, will remove the nurseries and most of the greenhouses to other property owned by him in Highland Park, adjoining.

White Plains Building Record.

Building in White Plains continues at an unusual rate, with only a slight decrease noted for June and this month. Last month the building permits issued by Building Inspector John A. Denehy totaled $203,240. This includes twenty-three residences, thirty garages, eight alterations, five business buildings, two apartments, one public garage and three signs.

The three-story brick building owned by George Fennell at 16 and 18 South Fourth Avenue, Mount Vernon, has been purchased by the Novelty 5, 10 and 25 Cent Store, conducted by Reiss Brothers, for $200,000. It is one of the first brick buildings erected on Mount Vernon's main business street.

A $60,000 addition is to be made to the two-story brick building at East Third Street and Tecumseh Avenue, Mount Vernon, owned by William F. Heyes, and it will then be one of the largest buildings devoted to the automobile business in Mount Vernon.

The construction of Larchmont's greatest improvement at the corner of Larchmont Avenue and Boston Post Road, to be known as Albee Court, has commenced. The Wennemer Construction Company has the contract.

The Nautilus Park Association, composed of property owners in Nautilus Park, New Rochelle, has been organized for the purpose of looking after the interests of that little community and its environs. The officers are Charles C. Drew, President; Major Frank White, Treasurer; Julius Kusche, Secretary. The membership includes Mrs. Lucille Fellows, Mrs. George R. White and Robert A. Berger.

Hudson Park, on Echo Bay, New Rochelle, has been getting more crowded each year, and the City Council has voted to purchase the property of Mrs. C. T. Kraemer, in Wildcliff, adjoining Hudson Park, for parking purposes. There is about an acre of land with a frame dwelling, and the price agreed upon is $27,000. There is a frontage on Hudson Park Road, and the new property will be opened into the park. It is expected that when the city takes possession in June, 1924, the traffic congestion in Hudson Park Road will be relieved.

BID FOR COLLEGE SITE.

Hunter Institution Gets $3,500,000 Offer From Builders.

Two offers for the site of Hunter College, which extends between Lexington and Park Avenues, at Sixty-eighth Street, have been received from builders and operators, according to Mrs. Marion R. Elliott, Chairman of the Building Committee, which is seeking a suitable location further uptown.

"One offer is for $3,000,000 and the other for $3,500,000," Mrs. Elliott said. "Both contain options that the purchasers are willing to wait three years before taking over the site to give us time to settle in our new home."

Mrs. Elliott said the committee could not accept an offer until it had decided on a new location.

BUILDING GROWTH EAST OF MANHATTAN

TRANSIT LAGS FAR BEHIND

B. H. Woodward of the Long Island Railroad Discusses the Past and the Future.

The tremendous growth of Long Island during the last twenty years is told by B. H. Woodward, General Passenger Agent of the Long Island Railroad Company, in an article written for "Brooklyn," a publication issued by the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce. A century ago, Mr. Woodward says, Long Island was a barren wilderness where lived the Indian, who used to watch the rising sun for the approach of enemies. He should have looked toward the west, for it was from this quarter that came the population that drove the Indian out and has increased the assessed valuation of realty in Queens in the last twenty years from $118,000,000 to $878,000,000, in Nassau from $25,000,000 to $192,000,000 and in Suffolk from $50,000,000 to $140,000,000.

"Within this period of twenty years," Mr. Woodward says, "railroad travel on the Long Island Railroad has grown seven times greater in 1922 than it was in 1903 and daily commuters sixteen times greater. Speaking of daily commuters, we find that in 1923 fully 60 per cent. of all the commuters using the Long Island system reside within the limits of Greater New York."

It is this growth within the city limits that caused the Long Island Railroad Company to warn the city that rapid transit service must be extended into Queens, to the end that the dense population could be accommodated.

During the twenty years which Mr. Woodward fixed as the time of the greatest increase in the population of Long Island have come sixteen tunnels connecting with Manhattan, to say nothing of the five bridges. Answering the question, "What has made Long Island grow so rapidly?" Mr. Woodward says:

"The natural resources and attractions of Island as a place for pleasure, recreation and for sports cannot be surpassed in the United States. All of these resources, with a coast line of over 250 miles, are located within the Empire State, and it is natural for the residents of the greater city to go to Long Island rather than to other sections of the metropolitan district.

"The evolution of highway transportation, which brought the motor cars in great numbers, naturally brought about good roads, and today Long Island is equipped with a good highway system.

"Mr. Woodward says that the only handicap the island must overcome is the lack of necessary highways between the city and the neighboring area on the island. He says:

"Highways which are in existence are narrow and not kept in repair, and the result is great congestion, and great confusion on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays, when those with motor cars desire to visit the country or the beaches. Plans, of course, are under way to relieve this condition by construction of the Queens 200-foot boulevard from the Queensboro Bridge to Jamaica, construction of the conduit pipe-line boulevard from Highland Park, Brooklyn, to the Suffolk County line at Amityville, and several trunk line projected improvements which, when completed, will solve the problem very satisfactorily."

Mr. Woodward admits that there is also need for improvement in the matter of railroad transportation. In reference to the difficulties of the problem facing the railroad company, he says:

"In 1903 the Long Island system handled 47,562,600 passengers and 2,104,500 tons of freight. In that year the taxes paid by the railroad amounted to $239,500. In the close of the twentieth year the number of passengers carried had increased to 79,657,000 and freight tonnage had increased to 6,028,000. Taxes had increased to $1,700,000. Therefore, in this period, 1903 to 1923, passengers had increased 280 per cent., freight tons 190 per cent., taxes 600 per cent. Gross income had increased 370 per cent., operating expenses 400 per cent., fixed charges 200 per cent.

"In the twenty years the railroad paid out for wages, fuel, material and supplies, $228,000,000. All of this money, outside of the cost of fuel and supplies, was spent by the 9,000-odd employes on Long Island. In the twenty years it paid for taxes $15,000,000, and for interest on its obligations $67,830,000. During the twenty years $66,000,000 was expended for improvements. The number of men employed had increased from 5,100 to 9,000, and the payrolls had increased from $3,065,000 to $14,792,000."

There was a let-up in expenditures during the war period, Mr. Woodward says, but the population of Long Island not only grew, and so became necessary in 1922 for the railroad company to spend $3,500,000 for improvements and equipment in an effort to catch up with the tide of population. Out of every dollar taken in by the company 16.67 cents is left to pay interest on bonds, equipment notes and other obligations. During the twenty year period three hundred crossings on the railroad line have been eliminated at a cost of more than $20,000,000. In concluding his glance at the past and present conditions Mr. Woodward has to say of the future:

"When we approach the subject of what the future holds forth for Long Island and the railroad system, one man's guess is perhaps as good as the other's. It is quite natural for a man in my position to judge the future by the past, and there is no doubt that the population of Long Island will continue to increase perhaps more rapidly in the next twenty years than it has in the last twenty years. Today Queens has a population of over 500,000; Nassau a population of 140,000 and Suffolk a population of 125,000.

"The fact that the owners of the Long Island system have been able to expend within the past twenty years the enormous sum of $66,000,000 seems to say augurs well for the future; and there is no doubt in my mind as to the policy of the owners in taking reasonably proper care of the territory the railroad serves in future as they have done in the past. Great studies must be decided upon within the next few years, and chief among them is the question of carfing for the intercity transit facilities required by the fast-growing population within the city limits.

"Electricity as motive power will predominate on the Long Island system within the next decade. It is seen to be the only method which can successfully handle the fast-growing communities on Long Island. The first extension will be via Montauk Division to Hempstead and then will follow further extensions as fast as population is dense enough to warrant it and the company is able financially to provide it."

Sale of Old Landmark.

The Manhattan Casino, at Eighth Avenue and 155th Street, three-story amusement landmark, is scheduled to be sold on the auction block on Aug. 6. The sale is the result of three actions brought against Edward S. Waldron and others for mortgage claims totaling about $30,000.

The foreclosure actions take in a frontage of 85 feet on Eighth Avenue and 500 feet on 155th Street, with a depth of 100 feet to the street fronting, excepting the corner lot.

The 155th Street end of the grounds used in connection with the amusement venture is not involved in the sale. The auctioneer in the assignment is Dollner, Potter & Dunning, with a minimum bid of $45,000; John G. Gotz, with a minimum of $14,000, and Abe Warren Shaw, with a claim of about $10,000. Henry Brady will be the auctioneer.

CIVIC BODY IN PROJECT.

Will Co-operate With Owners for Street Improvements.

Through an agreement reached by the Laurelton Civic Association, W. B. McKibben, President, and the owners of the unsold portions of this Queens Borough suburb, represented by M. Morgenthau Jr. Company, agents, a comprehensive plan of street improvements will be started immediately. At a recent meeting of representatives of the five distinct groups of property owners at Laurelton, including the new Queens Golf Links, the residents at Laurelton, the Laurelton Development Company and the non-resident property owners, it was decided to pool all interests and join hands with the Laurelton Civic Association, through which this work will be undertaken. The work will start with the clearing, crowning, oiling and rolling of the streets lying between the Long Island Railroad and Whitney Boulevard, and running from Franklin Boulevard west to Belmont Street.

In addition to this, Westminster Boulevard, which is the main boulevard running to the Laurelton station, on which many new houses are now in course of construction, will be finished and surfaced as far east as the new Queens Golf Links. Lewis & Thompson and the Golf Course Construction Company have announced that they will transfer their extensive plant which has just completed the golf course at Roslyn on the North Shore of Long Island to Laurelton and will complete construction of the eighteen-hole golf course this Summer, plant same in the Fall and be ready for playing in the Spring.

Under the agreement just arrived at the future maintenance of the streets at Laurelton will be in the hands of the Civic Association, to which practically all of the householders at Laurelton belong. They will maintain these streets and parkings, and funds for this purpose will be provided by the residents who have kept the beautiful parkings in order and the streets passable during the last few years while this property was tied up in a receivership and in involved litigation.

CITY BEAUTIFUL EXHIBIT.

Community Improvements Attract Attention at Atlantic City.

One of the prominent features of the Exposition of the American Home and City Beautiful Association on the Million-Dollar Pier this Summer are the exhibits pertaining to city improvements and beautification. The following members of the City Beautiful Committee have co-operated in promoting these exhibits: Nelson P. Lewis, Director of Physical Survey of New York City; John Nolen, City Planner of Cambridge, Mass.; Andrew Wright Crawford, Secretary of the Art Jury of Philadelphia; Carl Bannwart, Superintendent of New Jersey Shade Tree Division, Newark, N. J.; Harold S. Buttenheim, editor of The American City, and Harold W. Dodds, editor of The National Municipal Review.

Several of America's foremost city planners have exhibits including John Nolen of Cambridge, Electus D. Litchfield of New York, the Commission of Fine Arts of Washington, Buffalo City Planning Association and several prominent Atlantic City architects, among whom are Howard A. Stout, W. B. Riebenack, Bertram Ireland, Oscar Schmidt and A. F. Amodio.

The most elaborate exhibits are staged by John Nolen and Electus D. Litchfield. Mr. Nolen's exhibit shows his general plan for Mariemont, Ohio, the town hall, the bank, the town center and the industrial housing section; also a general city plan of Clewiston, Fla., and St. Petersburg, Fla., including the waterfront, and the development plan of St. Petersburg; also the housing plan of the General Chemical Company at Claymont, Del., and a real estate development at Erie, Pa., and a proposed farm city near Wilmington, N. C. Litchfield Village near Camden, N. C., has the colonial effect that the name implies. This village was planned by Electus D. Litchfield, and the photos and sketches are viewed with interest by a number of people en route to Atlantic City. Those have actually seen this artistic village.

SMALL BROOKLYN HOMES.

Bay Ridge Houses Offer Home and Investment.

A home and an investment in one is the latest feature being offered by the La-Aria Realty Corporation in its new four-family brick detached dwellings at Sixty-seventh Street, between Third and Fourth Avenues, in the Bay Ridge section of Brooklyn. The houses are being erected in one of the finest residential parts of Brooklyn.

They are detached, with driveways. There are three apartments of five rooms each and one apartment of four rooms. The builders say the houses will bring a return of $4,500 a year rentals. There are parquet floors throughout, tiled baths, electric lights, hot-water system and all modern improvements.

The houses are near the new Bay Ridge High School, and are directly opposite Bay Ridge Park, making it an ideal spot for children. The beautiful Shore Road Drive is within a few blocks distance from the property and the Fourth Avenue subway station at Sixty-ninth Street is within only a few minutes' walk.

Bay Front Lots at Auction.

At Edgemere a tract of 205 lots in the Rockaway coast district is to be sold at auction by the Jere Johnson Jr. Company, Fred B. Snow auctioneer, next Saturday, July 28, at 2:30 P. M., on the premises, rain or shine.

The lots to be sold include locations on the bay front and a number of business sites on Rockaway Boulevard. Most of the lots to be sold have sidewalks, curbs and sewers, and are located on Mermaid and Amster Avenues both of which are bay front thoroughfares, and on Beach Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Streets.

DESIGN THAT WON THE PARIS PRIZE OF BEAUX-ARTS ARCHITECTS

Artistic Color Treatment of the Pershing Square Building.

There are many interesting architectural features which contribute to the imposing dignity of the towering Pershing Square Building, one of the year's important additions to the Grand Central section. The architects, York & Sawyer, with John Sloan, have worked out the problems of contributing reasonable artistic beauty to a structure designed for practical business purposes in a very successful manner.

The façade on the three sides, Park Avenue, Forty-first and Forty-second Streets, is of burnt clay, combining three ceramic materials—terra cotta, brick and roofing tile. The result is a building of great architectural interest and one that will stand fire, weather and centuries of time. It is as nearly indestructible and as nearly permanent as a building can be.

The outstanding characteristics of the building are modeled detail and color. The terra cotta, provided by the Atlantic Terra Cotta Company, is modeled in the pre-Renaissance style of Lombardy and executed with care to prevent too great a mechanical nicety. In fact, many of the pieces were purposely roughened before kiln burning to help out the rugged texture.

The color is almost startling in its wide variation. In determining the color the architects looked five years ahead and selected one that would be mellowed by the city dust, but would never lose its life, never become a dull monotone and never look plain, ordinary. Golden brown is the dominant tone. The terra cotta not only harmonizes with the brick, but matches it in color.

In effect the color reverts to the original fire-flashed Pompeiian terra cotta. To accentuate the natural shadows of the lower story detail, coffee color and cerulean blue are used in the background to a limited extent. Terra cotta was the only material considered for the detail of the Pershing Square Building, and in designing the architects took full advantage of its color possibilities.

The foundation presented complex engineering problems, for the building is erected over the east side subway. The party wall between the Pershing Square Building and the Commercial Savings Bank is of hollow tile instead of brick, for the weight of a solid masonry wall would have necessitated a reduction of height by five or six stories in each building.

MONTAUK POINT HOTEL.

Poor Roads Have Delayed Erection of Big Structure.

Poor roads have caused the delay in erecting at Montauk Point a hotel to cost $3,000,000. A syndicate of New York City men has been organized, the money pledged, plans completed, and all that is now wanted is a better road. Between Amagansett and Montauk the road is in very poor condition, and it is this which delays the building of the hotel.

The new Montauk Point Hotel will have fine golf links and every convenience that the most modern seashore hotel in the country has.

"The construction of this road from Amagansett to Montauk Point," said Frank G. Holly, President of the Long Island Association, "is warranted by the fact that New York State is the only State that does not have a good road leading to its uttermost limits. I cite as an example the splendid road that runs to the end of Cape Cod in Massachusetts.

"The Long Island Association is interested in this matter because is is trying to build up all of Long Island, and if it can get this important development at the end of the island it is certain that the thousands who will go there will make stops at places between that point and Brooklyn."

Newark Manufacturers Buy Site.

The property at 688 and 690 South Sixteenth Street, near Nineteenth Avenue, Newark, was sold to the Gebhard Manufacturing Company. The sale was made for Henry J. Klasik by Feist & Feist. The new owners will immediately improve the vacant plot with a modern one-story building covering practically the entire premises, which will be used exclusively for the manufacturing of glass cigar box covers. This is the only industry of its kind in Newark.

Bay Ridge Realty Sale.

The two-story business building at 5,316-5,320 Fifth Avenue and the adjoining three-story structure on Fifty-fourth Street, Bay Ridge, have been sold to Edward Friedman, Inc., for about $225,000. Twenty years ago the seller bought the property for $35,000. The sale was negotiated by Tuthe & Co.

The Paris prize of the Society of Beaux-Arts Architects won by Leo Rombolis of the University of Pennsylvania was awarded for the best design on the subject, "An office and reception building for the President of the United States." According to the program, the plot on which the building would presumably be erected is 600 by 450 feet, the building not to exceed 300 feet in any dimension exclusive of steps and terraces.

The first floor in this conception of what the White House ought to be contains the office of the President, an office for his secretary and a Cabinet room. On the second floor there is to be a reception room suitable for large Presidential receptions. An underground passage would connect the proposed building with the White House. The program was written by Henry Bacon, architect of the Lincoln Memorial.

The Paris prize is a scholarship donated by the Society of Beaux-Arts Architects amounting to $3,000, entitling the winner to admission to the advanced class at the Ecole des Beaux Arts in Paris. The scholarship provides the winner with means to live in Paris and travel two and one-half years as a guest of the French Government, receiving the privilege of schools gratuitously.

Second place in the competition went to H. K. Bieg of the Department of Architecture of Armour Institute of Technology, Chicago, and third place to I. J. Loebl of the Armour Institute.

R. B. Thomas, Sr., and R. De Ghetto were declared "hors de concours," the jury having eliminated them because their final drawings departed from the subject as set forth in their sequisees.

The jury that made the selections was headed by James G. Rogers, and the drawings will be on exhibition at the society's headquarters, 126 East Seventy-fifth Street, until July 28, except Sunday, from 9 A. M. to 9 P. M.

GARDEN SUITES IN DEMAND.

Sales of garden apartments at Jackson Heights since the first of the year have reached a total of more than $1,716,000, according to F. G. Randall, Vice President of the Queensboro Corporation. In discussing the situation yesterday, Mr. Randall said:

"This remarkable selling record indicates that foresighted people this year are taking advantage of the wide selection of ready-for-occupancy garden apartments at Jackson Heights.

"The garden apartments we are selling at Jackson Heights are complete and ready for occupancy on or before Oct. 1. This is a distinct advantage, one that homeseekers appreciate, because it helps them to settle the question of where they are to live after Oct. 1.

"We find that a large number of the purchasers of garden apartments at Jackson Heights are closing their negotiations now in order that they may settle the question of a place to live before they go on their vacation. These people, when they return to town after Labor Day, have not to face the tragedy of city house hunting, and can move prior to Oct. 1 without having to pay the exorbitant rates demanded by moving concerns in the eleventh hour.

"Jackson Heights continues to attract business and professional men in large numbers, and among recent purchasers of this character are F. Olds, Treasurer of D. A. Blodgett Company; John D. Sayer, attorney; Russell T. Nixon of the Union Sulphur Company; R. K. Chrisman, chemist; Anson B. Gardner of the Westinghouse Electric Company; Harry M. Scripture, sales representative of Powdrell & Alexander, Inc.; Edward Wenning, proprietor of the Latham Litho & Printing Company; William J. Sullivan, attorney; John McGavack, chemist; Louis E. Smith, attorney; Wilfred Rabe, secretary to President of New York Trust Company; Wilbur B. Dexter, chemist, with National Carbon Company; Thomas Harris, lawyer, and John R. Broderick, insurance.

TO ERECT 100 HOMES.

Dwellings in Broadway-Flushing to Cost $1,000,000.

The Rickert-Brown Realty Company sold to Philip Kaye and Max Kosonovsky, operating as the Adelphi Homes Company, Inc., eight blocks of land comprising 235 lots in Broadway-Flushing, for $279,000, on which the purchasers will erect 100 one-family dwellings at a cost of approximately $1,000,000. The property is located between Broadway and Station Road and has 965 feet frontage on Twenty-eighth Street, 564 feet frontage on Twenty-ninth Street, 1,328 feet frontage on Thirtieth Street and 1,138 feet frontage on Thirty-first Street, making a total frontage of 5,995 feet.

The Auburndale sewer is now being constructed through the property at a cost of approximately $300,000, and all the city improvements will be installed by the purchasers as rapidly as the houses are completed.

The purchase by Kaye and Kosonovsky includes all the unsold land in Broadway-Flushing lying between Broadway and the Long Island Railroad and is the most important sale made in the Flushing section for several years. The houses will contain six, seven or eight rooms and one or two baths, and the selling prices will be from $11,000 to $15,000.

The building and permanent loans for the houses, which will be from $5,000 to $7,000 each, are being made by the Home Title Insurance Company.

Woodhaven Wants Buses.

Woodhaven and Richmond Hill civic associations have united to fight for the retention of buses, pointing out the lack of trolley lines and that the buses run where surface cars do not.

BUILDING LOAN PROGRESS.

Secretary Tells of the Growth of Association.

Savings and loan associations grew at the rate of more than 10 per cent. in the United States during the ten years, 1910-1920, according to Archibald W. McEwan, Secretary of the State and Metropolitan League of Savings and Loan Associations.

"In 1921 and 1922," said Mr. McEwan, "when conditions were such that thousands of persons who had not previously heard of these beneficent organizations came into the fold, many for the purpose of buying homes, the growth was more than 15 per cent.

"In this State the assets have reached $153,000,000, a growth of $22,000,000 over 1921. The result has been that every association in this section (including suburban New Jersey) was swamped with applications for mortgages.

"The associations were thus in a position to point out to these applicants that it was hardly fair to give them mortgage money when they had never deposited a penny of their savings with the associations, and that they should show their good faith by doing so, as savings are favored in mortgage loans.

"This pronouncement carried great weight, as practically all the money lent by associations comes from savers, except some provided by the Land Bank, an institution operated exclusively to provide associations with mortgage money, and the outcome was that thousands of dollars of new deposits were gathered in from this source alone, to say nothing of the amounts received from new savers, who suddenly awoke to the fact that 5 per cent. dividends are paid each year with absolute safety.

"It is only natural that the depositors (members) should be preferred for mortgage money, when it is remembered that these are co-partnership institutions and that every member has his say in the management if he desires to exercise it.

"These associations were the pioneers in amortised mortgages seventy years ago, notwithstanding many statements to the contrary, and the plan is comparatively new.

"In a word, the mortgages of all savings and loan associations are paid off in substantially the same manner with some difference in detail. The main results are shown, however, for with $10 per month paid in on each $1,000, a mortgage is paid up in about twelve years.

"Many persons have an impression that a savings and loan mortgage is tied up indefinitely, or until it is paid up through credits on payments and dividends thereon. This, of course, is not true. The mortgagor can sell his property at any time, all the association obviously insists on is that its money is protected, and all the credits on mortgage are paid to the borrower.

"It cannot 'call' its mortgages; these run until the 'due' and dividends equal the face of the mortgage. No money is ever lent on savings mortgages—the State Banking Law prohibits it.

"Speaking generally, savings and loan associations are universally recognized as the people's institutions, as their sole objects are to promote home-owning and thrift.

"The Federal Government has always exempted them from various taxes, and under the present income tax law dividends in any one year to the amount of $300 are untaxed. The State Banking law provides that they may lend on improved property on first mortgages to 80 per cent. of an appraised valuation, the only organizations under the State Banking Department that have this privilege. Amounts up to $900 deposited in these associations are exempt from the execution in bankruptcy proceedings, and legislators have always recognized their great value in the promotion of good citizenry.

"The associations are under the same laws as savings banks and they are examined by the department periodically, and the directors are required to take oaths of office."

Plan New High School.

Announcement is made by the Richmond Hill Civic Association that ground will be broken for the first wing of the Richmond Hill High School some time next month or September. J. W. Tiedemann said that only one wing at a time will be erected. He further stated that it would take approximately one year to build each wing. The members entered complaint against the building being erected at Ninety-second Avenue and One Hundred and Thirtieth Street.

New Maspeth Bank.

P. A. Rowley, Vice President of the Bank of the Manhattan Company in charge of the Queens and Brooklyn offices, has announced that the Superintendent of Banks had given his consent to the opening of an office by the Bank of the Manhattan Company at the corner of Metropolitan and Flushing Avenues, in lower Maspeth. A building has been purchased which will be remodeled at once.

Realty Expert Examination.

The United States Civil Service Commission announces an open competitive examination for real estate expert. The salary ranges from $2,100 a year to $12 per day. Further details may be had at the Post Office or Custom House, Manhattan. The number of the bulletin is 236-B. Receipt of applications will close July 31.

Huntington Has Chamber.

The Huntington Association has changed its name to the Huntington Chamber of Commerce. Frederick R. Farnsworth is the new President of the chamber.

$782,900 Queens Improvements.

NEW HOUSING RULES.

Realty Board Calls Attention to Rules on Equipment.

The Real Estate Board of New York calls the attention of property owners and tenants to proposed new rules and regulations pending before the Board of Standards and Appeals.

A number of hearings have been held, the last one on July 19; but none of the rules has been adopted except tentatively. The first set of regulations apply to the use of fuel oil and cover the burning equipment, storage, construction and installation of oil and the use of fuel oils.

There are twenty-three proposed regulations, and it is important that they should be carefully considered by every owner or tenant contemplating the use of fuel oil. The Building Laws and Regulations Committee of the Real Estate Board of New York is giving very careful consideration to these rules and registering its approval, modification or disapproval with the Board of Standards and Appeals.

The second set of regulations governs fire extinguishing appliances, standpipes and fire lines. These rules are forty-five in number and cover standpipes, standpipe equipment, tanks, valves, suction tanks, pumps, piping risers, pressure tanks, nozzles, hose, siamese connections, pressure regulations and all matters that have to do with sprinkler equipments. It is extremely important that property owners and tenants should familiarize themselves with these extremely important regulations.

The third set of regulations has to do with the installation and maintenance of gas cut-off valves recently authorized by the Board of Aldermen.

It is mandatory that the Fire Commissioner shall order the installation of gas cut-off valves in all buildings in the city except one and two family houses. These rules cover in detail the installation and maintenance of these devices and will affect at least 150,000 buildings. Property owners generally are interested.

The bulletin of the Board of Standards and Appeals for July 17, 1923, contains these rules, and the bulletins can be had on application at the office of the Board of Standards and Appeals, ninth floor, Municipal Building, New York City.

OFFERS BELLAIRE SITES.

Auction Sale Will Involve 375 Home Lots.

At Bellaire, L. I., Bryan L. Kennelly, Inc., will hold a sale of 375 tax-exempt New York City lots on Saturday, Aug. 11. Bellaire is essentially a home community. These 375 home sites on Hillside Avenue, Jamaica, the main middle island automobile thoroughfare between 213th and 214th Streets and Ninety-first Avenue, are in the heart of the Borough of Queens.

This property is known as the Vandergaw property and adjoins Buckingham Park, but one block from Queens Road.

As an investment or as a builder's opportunity, this property could hardly be better within the limits of the greater city. One hundred houses have been built and ninety of these sold in one year on property adjoining this site.

On Wednesday of this week, July 25, Bryan L. Kennelly has announced that he will hold a special sales day in the Real Estate Exchange at 12 o'clock noon. The properties to be offered include parcels in Manhattan, Brooklyn, Bronx and Westchester County. The Manhattan properties are as follows: A five-story studio building at 54 West Tenth Street, a three-story brick dwelling and three-story brick stable at 522 Greenwich Street, a five-story stone building, with two stores, at 134 West Forty-sixth Street, and a four-story factory building at 324 Avenue A. In Brooklyn, a three and four story apartment house, with stores, at 1,078-1,082 Bedford Avenue will be offered, and also a three-story apartment house, with store, at 1,236 Rogers Avenue. A vacant plot in the Bronx on Rhinelander Avenue, at the southeast corner of Seymour Avenue, will also be offered.

On Saturday of the following week Mr. Kennelly will hold an auction sale of 120 lots at Sea Cliff, L. I. This property fronts on Glen Cove Avenue, Eighth Avenue and adjoining avenues. The sale will be held at 2 P. M. on the property in a large tent, rain or shine.

West Side Tenement Sold.

M. Morgenthau Jr. Company-Everett M. Seixas Company Consolidated have sold for Henry Sandrock, 527 West Forty-fourth Street a four-story and basement front and rear tenement house, on plot 25 by 100.5. The property immediately adjoins Public School 51 and enjoys permanent side light. It is located between Tenth and Eleventh Avenues. The purchaser is Samuel Rosenberg. The property was held at $115,000 and rents for over $8,500.

English Residence for South Orange.

Ewart J. White has let a contract to the Patterson-King Corporation for the design and construction of an English residence on his property located directly opposite the South Orange Tennis Club grounds at South Orange, N. J. The estimated cost is $40,000.

BROKERS' LICENSE LAW.

Many Good Results Obtained—Amendments Being Considered.

The new license law is producing results. Deputy Tax Commissioner McCaffrey announces that more than 100 complaints regarding violations of the law have been received by his bureau and that a majority of them have been settled by correspondence.

Prosecutions for operating as a real estate broker or salesman without a license have resulted in favorable decisions by municipal courts.

The collection of commissions by a person not licensed has been denied also by the courts.

Promoters attempting to sell lands in other States at exorbitant prices and upon greatly exaggerated claims have been stopped from doing business in this State.

Reprimands have been given for unethical practices.

Improvements in the license law are being considered by the License Law Committee of the New York State Association of Real Estate Boards, and helpful amendments will probably be introduced in the next Legislature.

The committee plans to issue a digest of the law, outlining its essential requirements, all rulings of the Attorney General as to its interpretation and decisions on important violations.

Recent rulings by the Attorney General on the license law are as follows: No person may be licensed both as a broker and as a salesman. Acts constituting violations of the license law, but which were committed prior to the enactment of the law on Oct. 1, 1922, generally will not be held by the courts to be sufficient for penalties except in the most flagrant cases of felony or fraud. Complains of such nature should not be made except on legal advice.

In a recent address before the Executive Committee of the State Association Deputy Commissioner McCaffrey said:

"We cannot yet assess the full value of the real estate license law. It is the potential force for raising the standard of your profession. There is no agency with wider possibilities.

"Its ultimate aim is to give honest and more intelligent service to the public. But understand, you cannot legislate honor and honesty into a man.

"To break bad habits, to establish good ones, to make human beings entirely as they should be is not possible by force of law. Moral suasion, the power of example, condemnation by public opinion of that which is bad are the greatest influences that are effective.

"This law, in itself, can only be effective to a degree. Both you and its administrators must give it aid.

"We pledge ourselves to administer it with energy, common sense and judgment. This, with the united determination on the part of members of real estate boards to co-operate in our efforts, will result in that being accomplished which you had in mind when drawing the bill."

TO SELL 340 LOTS.

Long Island City Sites Will Be Offered at Auction.

With the construction of apartment houses by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company and of one and two family dwellings by local building interests in the Thompson Hill section of new Long Island City, adjacent to the Queensboro subway, considerable interest attaches to the announcement that Joseph P. Day, auctioneer, will sell by absolute auction 340 lots on Borden, Debevoise and Clinton Avenues, a few blocks from the Bliss Street station of the Queensboro subway and on the route of the Borden Avenue trolley car line.

The sale will be held on Saturday, Aug. 4, at 2 P. M., on the premises, rain or shine, and is the first auction sale of lots in this section held in several years.

South of the lots to be sold in Queensboro Plaza business section and the Degnon Terminal industrial district, where many factories already established employ thousands of operatives, many of whom have been unable to find housing facilities in Long Island City, and who therefore, are obliged to live long distances from their work in other sections of Long Island, in Brooklyn, Manhattan and the Bronx.

A small block of thirty-six lots at Laurelton, Borough of Queens, is to be sold at absolute auction by Mr. Day on Tuesday evening, Aug. 7, at 8 o'clock, in the Brooklyn Real Estate Exchange, 189 Montague Street.

Included in the sale is a two-story and attic brick and frame building, located at Cortlandt Boulevard near Laurelton Boulevard. The lots are located on Springfield Boulevard, Mills Lane and 204th Street, and comprise part of the development known as Laurelton Pines.

The property is in part improved with sidewalks, water and electric light, and there are schools, churches and stores near by.

Licensed Brokers' Roster.

As required by the real estate license law, the State Tax Commission has published its first annual roster of licensed brokers and salesmen, listing all real estate brokers and salesmen licensed by the State up to Dec. 31, 1922. The roster contains the names of 11,062 brokers and 5,555 salesmen.

It is planned to issue a supplementary roster containing the names of all those licensed since Jan. 1, 1923. Deputy State Tax Commissioner Frank E. McCaffrey has announced that succeeding annual rosters will hereafter be published promptly during January or February, with monthly supplementary rosters, including decisions and rulings, thereafter.

Erecting Semi-Detached Houses.

The homes are of brick construction, having all the latest improvements. They are located in one of the finest sections of Brooklyn, and an outstanding feature of the homes is the fact that they are semi-detached. This gives the family light and air on all sides and also affords a driveway.

TIMBER SHORTAGE AFFECTS HOUSING

COST INCREASE 200%

Lumber and Paint for Ready-Cut Houses Jumped From $883 to $2,900.

For the guidance of the twenty-eight member organizations of the Federated American Engineering Societies, comprising more than 50,000 engineers in all parts of the country, Colonel William B. Greeley, chief of the United States Bureau of Forestry, has prepared a statement on the national consequences of timber depletion.

Colonel Greeley warns that the predicted timber famine has already overtaken the Eastern and Central sections of the United States. Smaller and poorer houses are being built, timber is being destroyed faster than it is being replaced, quality is growing poorer, and prices are becoming higher. American living standards, particularly on the farm, are being threatened, asserts Colonel Greeley, who is actively aiding the Federated American Engineering Societies in a nation-wide movement for reforestation.

Colonel Greeley's summary of the situation, made public yesterday by Charles H. MacDowell of Chicago, Chairman of the Engineering Federation Reforestation Committee, follows:

"Originally the United States contained five trillion board feet of stumpage; now only 1,000,000,000,000 feet of virgin timber and 600,000,000,000 feet of cutled and second growth remains.

"Timber is being cut or destroyed at the rate of 60,000,000,000 board feet per year. Soft wood is being cut eight times as fast as it is being replaced, and hardwood three times as fast. Seventy-five per cent. of all timber being cut is not being replaced. Transportation is the key to lumber supply.

"Removal of the timber supply from points of consumption because of transportation charges has created retail prices so high that many demands for lumber cannot be satisfied. Twenty-eight States produce less lumber than they consume. Only five States in 1920 produced more lumber than they consumed. In the space of seven years the average lumber haul between sawmill and consumer has increased 84 per cent.

"Rail charges on Western timber are $17.50 per thousand feet to the Middle West, and $25 to New York. Retail prices rise much higher than the increase in transportation charges justify. The average consumer pays twice as much for ordinary lumber as he paid twelve years ago. The average price of retail lumber advanced from 1840 to 1921 three and one-half times as rapidly as the index price of all commodities. In 1870 the per capita consumption was 345 board feet; in 1906 it was 616 board feet; in 1920 it had dropped to 315 board feet.

"Timber famine, as to Eastern and Central of the United States, is not hypothetical or distant; it is here. It is evidenced by smaller and poorer houses; reduction in number of and maintenance of farm buildings. Lumber and paint for ready-cut one-story five-room house were listed in 1915 at $883, and today at about $2,900, an increase of over 200 per cent.

"Scarcity of and high price for good lumber has led to increasing use of poorer quality. There is probably not a single wood fabricating industry east of the Mississippi and Northern Ohio and Potomac Rivers which does not today use wood distinctly inferior in intrinsic quality to that used twenty years ago. There is necessity now for teaching a vastly needed lesson of economy and of adopting new woods to old uses.

"Grading of lumber must cease to be a matter of custom and become a matter of science. To examine the grades must be furnished with exact knowledge of quality and forms of service forest products can render. The United States consumes about two-fifths of the forest products manufactured in the world.

"Our per capita consumption of paper and other materials made from wood fibre has increased from 30 to 140 pounds in forty years. It about doubles that of England, the nearest competitor. National habits in the use of wood have to be changed; the question is how much social and economic suffering will this change involve and what can be done to alleviate it. The per capita consumption in other countries is increasing, not decreasing. The demands in the United States are not going to decrease.

"Eighty-eight per cent. of rural dwellings in the United States are made of lumber. One of the crying needs in some agricultural sections is for better homes and the higher living standards which depend largely upon better homes.

First, make the timber we have go as far as it will through reducing waste and improving the efficiency of its use.

Second, make progress rapidly as possible toward permanent and sustaining supply of timber by increasing the growth in woodlands and by putting idle acres to work growing trees.

"To sum up," he adds, "the economic and social losses involved and the rapid depletion of the forests of the United States are so large and far-reaching as to challenge the attention of our most profound thinkers, to the end that there may be a more comprehensive plan for the elimination of waste in the growth and utilization of forest products and for reforestation."

BLACKWELL'S ISLAND SALE.

Advertised as Beautiful Suburban Homestead in 1784.

New York's historic Blackwell's Island, the name of which was recently obliterated, being now known as Welfare Island, was offered for sale in 1784. The announcement appeared in March of that year in The New York Packet, and the description of its beauties and home comforts indicates that it was a very agreeable suburban residential locality. The notice reads:

"For Sale: That pleasant, agreeably situated island known by the name of Blackwell's Island. On the East River, about four miles from this city. It is, without exception, one of the most healthy situations in this State. It is remarkable for the number of fish and fowl that are caught there in the different seasons. There are on the premises two small dwelling houses, a barn, bake and fowl house, cider mills, a large orchard containing 400 of the best grafted fruit trees, such as Newton and Golden pippins, pearmains, pears, peaches, plums, cherries, &c.

"There is a number of the best stone quarries, and the subscriber's house has a complete set of quarry tools with all the farming utensils and stock to carry on at the same time. The island abounds with many springs of most excellent water. It contains 107 acres, eight of which are salt meadow, and the whole has been considerably improved in manure and is in good fence. Any person indicating to purchase the whole or half of the island may be further informed by inquiring at Mr. Joseph Hallett's, 201 Water Street, New York, or on the premises of James Blackwell."

BEVERLY COURT SOLD TO RUSSELL R. WHITMAN

Russell R. Whitman of Forest Hills, owner of The New York Commercial and President of the Roosevelt Military Academy, has purchased Beverly Court at Malba-on-the-Sound, Long Island, from the Malba Estates Corporation, through Champ & Dasey, sales directors. The property consists of a large Colonial residence with extensive grounds, adjoining the residence of Roy Cheshton on Malba Drive and opposite the waterfront home of Grover C. Trumbull.

MEMORIAL IN BLOOMINGDALE'S

A replica of the art of the old Italian masters is being constructed in Bloomingdale Brothers' department store, Fifty-ninth to Sixtieth Street, Lexington to Third Avenue.

The grand memorial stairway which is now under construction will be an adaptation of the main staircase in the famous palace of the Podestas, the Bargello, in Florence, Italy. It is being made in the warm tones of Travertin, edged with panels of beautiful Italian mosaic.

It was while touring Europe a short while ago that S. J. Bloomingdale visited the Bargello, in connection with his studies in architecture, and was inspired with its wondrous staircase.

It occurred to him that an adaptation of this artistic masonry would be a fitting memorial to his father, Lyman G. Bloomingdale, the founder of Bloomingdale's, to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of his founding of the store on April 1, 1872. Mr. Bloomingdale, together with the Architect, Miss Harris Jones, designed the staircase.

Two of the latest type elevators are also being installed. The artistic effects of the elevators will harmonize with the beauty of the staircase. They will have all the recent improvements, such as the self-leveling device and the automatic door. When these elevators are completed, Bloomingdale's will have nine passenger elevators in the building.

It is expected that the work will all be completed by Oct. 1.

Two Family Brick Convertible Houses
Astoria—Queensboro

OVER 90 of these 182 houses now under construction sold in response to six different advertisements. Future value, that the pick of location will command, is attracting the shrewd buyer who realizes that a three-story house on a street fully improved for $11,400 is the lowest priced 2-family brick house to be had anywhere—and under the most remarkable Purchase Plan, which requires cash payments aggregating only $1,500 to secure deed and $84.19 a month, which covers mortgage reduction and interest payment on balance.

The rental value of the entire house, based on offers had, is $150 per month ($50 for the third floor of 3 rooms, kitchenette, and bath, and $100 for the "Downstairs House" of 7 rooms); combined they provide a single dwelling of 10 rooms and 2 baths. Descriptive pamphlet on request.

The Word "Sterling"

surname of the late owner of this estate, is equally applicable in describing the character of the acreage home sites into which it is now in process of subdivision. The location is one of the most desirable and accessible in Westchester County. The whole vicinity abounds in fine country places and clubs and the surrounding landscape is famous for its beauty. In addition, the unusual type of the improvements already installed makes these properties unique among residence colonies.

Do You Recognize Good Construction in Small Houses?

We have three attractive houses located in a beautiful section of Dobbs Ferry-on-Hudson, in which the builders are making a test to see if the average home-buyer will recognize quality above quantity. They each contain center hall, large living room with open fireplace, dining room and kitchen on the first floor and 3 bedrooms and tiled bath on second floor; they are heated by hot water heat, the floors are all oak, the doors are extra heavy for a small house, the foundations are cut more—every item is of the best; the plot is 50x100 and they are so arranged as to have a maximum amount of garden space, air and sunshine. The prices are $13,500 each. See them today. Call Dobbs Ferry 34 and arrange appointment.

The Apartment Hotel

Offers You the Utmost in Living Conditions

The Apartment Hotel is the proper manner of existence for those people who live busily, yet graciously.

The man or woman who appreciates the finer things of life, selects this distinctive mode of living, not only because it is more economical, but because it presents the highest standard of personal service obtainable.

The West Side Hotels—a fashionable group of luxuriously equipped and ideally managed Apartment Hotels, in the West Side residential section, from 59th Street to 110th Street, between Central Park West and the River—offer an extremely high plane of residential life.

They are individually conducted by the best hotel men in the country. They provide accommodations and service infinitely superior to the ordinary housekeeping apartment. Suites of rooms, from two rooms to any number desired, are available—at the rate per room per year unfurnished from $700.00 to $1400.00, or furnished from $800.00 to $1800.00—including service.

All of the West Side Hotels have first-class Restaurants, run on the European Plan. Rates not excessive—cost based on individual demands, estimated as low as $12.00 per week up per person.

The Managers of any of the following West Side hotels will gladly give you the facts and the figures and any number of personal experiences in proof. Call personally or write. Do it now; for apartment hotel apartments are still limited.

Site of
655 PARK AVENUE
Co-operative Apartments
67TH TO 68TH STREETS

655 PARK AVENUE

Easterly Block Front 67th to 68th Streets

THE entire block front on the east side of Park Ave., from 67th to 68th Streets, has been purchased by interests closely identified with this distinctive residential section, which forms the crest of Lenox Hill.

These interests have restricted the property against improvement with a tall building, and disposed of it to 655 Park Avenue, Incorporated.

No. 655 Park Avenue, will be only 7 stories in height in the front and 10 stories in the rear.

In dignity of architectural design, this new co-operatively owned apartment building will maintain the high standards set by the owners of the palatial private dwellings erected opposite, in the west side of the Avenue.

From the standpoint of the future protection of light and air, the new building has for its immediate neighbors the comparatively low buildings occupied by the Seventh Regiment, Hunter College and Baptist Home.

It will be possible in this new building to purchase apartments of 7 to 18 rooms, or entire floors designed to order; also maisonettes, with separate entrances, on 67th Street and apartments with roof gardens. The building has been designed by J. E. R. Carpenter and Mott B. Schmidt, associate architects, who have designed a number of the most prominent and successful apartment houses in the Fifth and Park Avenue residential districts.

ARE YOU THE WOMAN?

A woman who realizing the limitations of a job desires to engage in a business where she can give fullest expression to her ability, and who knows she can succeed where other women have, upon a commission basis.

To such a woman this is what we offer:

A business of her own which will be permanent, with greater earnings than she has heretofore enjoyed and an assurance of her future.

Complete office facilities.

Many women have made distinct successes in our business without previous experience.

Mrs. Golden will be glad to discuss the matter with you further.

SELF-ASSERTION IN WOMEN.
Among the business and professional women whom the Merton Institute has vocationally analyzed in the last few weeks, only two possessed to a serviceable degree the faculty of self-assertion; it is an important one in business life; men possess it in larger proportion, for they have had to develop it in order to forge ahead and hold their ground.

The service that makes the Merton analytic method of vocational guidance of great value to the modern woman is the ability to direct her into the vocation her dominant faculties fit her for, and tell her why.

The Merton method has stood a test of thirty years and is employed and endorsed by banks, manufacturing concerns, sales managers, teachers, lawyers, &c. What it has accomplished for others it can do for you. Write in person for full particulars. Open for consultation Saturday P. M.

YOU ARE THE MAN.
The sort of men we want are those who seek an exceptionally good monetary return for the effort they put into their work. If you are the man we seek—call upon us. The proposition is being handled by an established financial house of many years standing—it did not spring up over night. It has had successes for years. And the thing you will sell will help mankind, your country and a deserving cause. You don't have to be a "go-getter," meaning a high-powered salesman to sell securities; we want men who have the making of producers and with leads, sales instruction, courtesy and helpfulness we will make our men make money and they will stay with us as others we have employed. Don't hesitate, whether you are a real producing salesman or not, if you want a chance to build on a commission basis until you prove yourself, see
MR. LAIRD, SECOND FLOOR,

MALE HELP WANTED. Salesmen.

A WONDERFUL OPPORTUNITY
CONDITIONS THAT VIRTUALLY GUARANTEE RESULTS.
Every thoughtful salesman of experience knows that the biggest incomes to salesmen are earned in the life insurance business.
But it is not an easy game.
True.
Circumstances of a very extraordinary nature give us an opportunity to furnish leads—real leads—living, vital, compelling leads.
What a wonderful chance to break into the greatest game in the world under conditions "ALMOST TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE."
BUT YOU MUST BE A SALESMAN and YOU MUST BE ABLE TO PROVE IT if you want to "get in" on this wonderful chance.
WE CAN USE ONLY A LIMITED NUMBER. If you think you are the man we want, come early.
Call on J. H. Huntington Jr. at 118 West 44th St., Room 605, and learn the particulars.
